PHILADELPHIA.

REPRESENTATIVES of the Kinemacolor motion picture concern declared that permission had been granted by Provost Smith, of the University of Pennsylvania, to take a series of pictures of the institution, the first university of the world to be thus photographed.

Arrangements are now in progress with the Publicity Bureau of the University to photograph such events as May Day, Class Day, Alumni Day, Commencement Day, the Mask and Wig play, boat crew practice and the events on Franklin Field, all in their natural colors. Pictures of the University campus and buildings will also be included.

The Bijou Theater is showing local talent this week in connection with pictures, and large crowds are attending this popular house, of which Mr. Dougherty is manager.

The Motiograph Company, Inc., was repersented in this city last week by Mr. Woodward, who was demonstrating a few new features and improvements on the new machine.

The moving picture theater at Millville, N. J., operated by former Assemblyman Christopher Hand, will be enlarged and improved.

Orders were issued by the police officials that pictures of the Titanic could not be shown in Philadedphia, as all of them were fakes, and were pictures taken of the Olympic.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company will build a one-story addition to its plant at the northeast corner of Twentieth Street and Indiana Avenue.

Showmen who have been victimized by fake insurance men have rejoiced at the arrest of James Burton Scott, whose scheme it was to go to the proprietor of an establishment and write him up for insurance, and then pocket the premiums. He has been held in $10,000 bail for the United States Court.

A theater with 3,000 capacity and convention hall with seating capacity for 12,000 people are planned for Young's Pier, Atlantic City, in an order to the architects for a $1,000,000 structure. The new pier will be 170 feet wide and 2,500 feet in length.

Nelson Z. Graves, of Philadelphia, will convert the Delaware Bay House, at Cape May Point, into a modern amusement pavilion, with provisions for moving picture exhibitions.

The Beach and Park Amusement Company has been incorporated at Harrisburg, with headquarters in Philadelphia, and a capital of $10,000.

Official denial has been given the rumor that the Nixon & Zimmerman firm will dissolve. There is an agreement between the members of the firm expiring with the current year, made in order to give to each individual the protection of the firm's name.

Henry C. Strinberg, owner of the moving picture theater at 5206-08 Market Street, has conveyed title to Emil H. Ratzburg for a nominal consideration subject to $25,000 mortgage. The property covers a lot 33 by 214 feet, and is assessed at $27,500.

The Precision Machine Company, Inc., will give a demonstration of the Simplex motion picture machine, at the Calhuff Supply Company, which will last for some time.

The Quaker Film Exchange has booked a large number of feature films, which are of two and three reels, and the Philadelphia pictures are well pleased with the service, and keep Mr. Gaff quite busy importing this line of films.

The Broad Street Theater, at Trenton, N. J., has again changed hands, and the owners Haverson & Ginisky, will now run it themselves. The theater has a seating capacity of 2,000.

Norvin McHose, of Loew's National, was taken suddenly sick while at the theater and was removed to the Jefferson Hospital, where it was found that he was suffering from appendicitis, and an operation was necessary at once.

F. Wm. Kamp, with the Calhuff Supply Company, said that it would be a good thing for the fire inspectors to get busy and look over some of the smaller theaters of the city, which are in very bad condition. One place he says that they have a fire-escape constructed of wood and only one door at each end of the building, and in other theaters that he chances to go into he finds that aisles in some are only two feet wide. It is time that such places are taken care of by the authorities.

Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Shelton, of Philadelphia, have built a unique little theater, which is maintained as a private amusement.

It has a seating capacity of about sixty people and all the modern fixtures for showing pictures and staging a play. The stage is ten feet wide and twelve feet deep and nothing has been overlooked in making it strictly up to date. It is called the Theater Helene, after the owner's young daughter.

Deputy Factory Inspector Egolf, of Norristown, as a result of an inspection of the Colonial Theater, in Phoenixville, where there was a serious panic last week, condemned the practice of selling standing room. The manager, Mr. Brownback, was also forbidden to allow patrons of his picture house to store baby carriages and perambulators in the hallway approaching the box office, and was directed to keep the entrance clear.

When the crowd made its rush for the theater doors last week, following a false alarm of fire, its progress through the lobby was hindered by baby coaches and the crowd waiting for admission to the house.

George N. Whippie sued James K. Bowen and Gilbert H. Aymar, of Allentown, trading as the Kinemacolor Company, for the return of $8,000 paid in and $2,000 damages for breach of contract for failure to deliver moving picture machines which were to reproduce scenes in their original colors, the project having ended in a failure.

Notices have been sent to certain local picture men by trust companies handling small accounts that a charge of $1 will be made hereafter on deposit accounts which drop below $100 on the quarterly balance. As many managers of picture houses and other establishments keep their main account in a national bank, and utilize a nearby trust compay for small day to day balances, they are affected by the decision of the trust company men that such small accounts must hereafter pay their way.

Concluding that the position of manager of a moving picture theater was somewhat at variance with his duties as pastor of the Margate M. E. Church, at Atlantic City, Rev. Eugene L. Nixon has resigned as manager of the City Square Theater to the owners.

Mrs. Jennie Effinger has given the contract to B. Ketcham's Son for a theater at the southwest corner of Forty-first street and Lancaster Avenue, which is to cost $45,000. When completed it will be one of the finest picture houses in that section of the city.

The J. D. Allen Company is preparing plans for a moving picture theater, occupying a lot recently purchased by George F. and Walter Stumpfig, at the northwest corner of Germantown Avenue and Venango Street. It will cost about $100,000.

Alterations to the amount of about $8,400 are being made at the Point Breeze Park. Several new buildings are being put up and the management looks for a busy season.

A charter has been granted to the Perkins Amusement Company, of Cambridge Springs. Capital, $25,000.

P. J. MacCaffray, a moving picture operator of this city, has just returned from Mexico, where he with about twenty actors and actresses had been for the purpose of making pictures of bull fights and other subjects. But the greater part of the time was used in protecting their lives that not much was used in taking the pictures. Although they did get a few pictures the natives were so hostile that they did not get the desired amount.

On several occasions the actors were stoned, and at other times they were arrested and placed in jails and almost daily they were stopped on the streets and searched by the authorities who confiscated all firearms.

They were confined in jails no less than a dozen times and suffered many hardships before reaching the states, and they said that no more picture work would they consent to do in Mexico, as long as things were so unsettled.

J. J. Keenan is having plans made for a picture theater, at Germantown Avenue and Durham Street. The building will be 28 x 114 feet and will be of the latest design.

J. B. Febler Moving Picture School Company, of Wilmington, Del., has been incorporated with a capital of $200,000.

Another season of summer entertainment will commence in the Grand Opera House, Broad and Montgomery Avenue, on Monday, May 13th, under the management of Stair & Havlin, who so ably conducted previous summer seasons in the big uptown playhouse.

Motion pictures and high-class vaudeville will be shown, with three performances each day. A mammoth new screen has been installed as well as several new electrical effects which will produce pictures that have not been equalled.

George B. Graff, of the Quaker Feature Film Exchange, was kept busy on May 7th, receiving the congratulations of his many friends, on account of his birthday, and most of the men who chanced to get a few words went off smoking a "perfecto." Along with the happy occasion, he surprised himself, by placing a fine a new rug on the floor of his private office, and other alterations.

The Jumbo Theater, Front and Girard Avenue, is having its roof raised, with the idea of putting a gallery in the house. This will give about 100 more seats and will make a better appearance in the design of the interior.

Paddy's Island on the Delaware River, will be turned into a summer resort. The management is now busy putting the finishing touches to the amusements, which will include a large picture house. Boats will run from Philadelphia and Camden, to the island, and large crowds are anticipated to spend their time as well as their money at this resort.

Edward Kruapa, of the Monarch Film Exchange, is very busy getting out his supply of films for the summer resorts, and has several large contracts. He also books a large number of vaudeville acts.

The Family Theater, of Clifton Heights, is now under the management of Charles O'Donnell, and is presenting a fine line of pictures and vaudeville.

The Chestnut Street Opera House, of Philadelphia, has had a limited engagement of Dante's "Inferno."

Robert Holt, of the Clifton Heights Theater, has changed houses, and is now in a larger and better house, and enjoying a much larger trade.

The Calhuff Supply Company shipped an Edison model type E machine to Juhling and Gaujot, at Williamson, W. Va.

Ocean City, N. J., is about to have a new house, which will be opened under the management of Brown and Savage, two well-known picture men, and they will give the people of that city the very best pictures that can be had.

The fire chief of Atlantic City has issued orders that the strings that were used on the machines to hold up the shutter must now be replaced with pieces of film, so that if the heat gets too great, they will drop, and thus get rid of the danger of fire.

J. L. Hart, of Farmville, Va., ordered a No. 6 Powers machine from the Calhuff Supply Company, for the theater he is about to open.

Dostor Harringan is now running stock company in connection with pictures at his theater at Darby, Pa.

Managers of local picture houses have been notified by the fire inspectors that they must use enclosed reel winders. They have been looking over the theaters in this city and have found a number of faults with the houses, and are now trying to get them in a safer condition.

M. H. Mark, by arrangement with the Kinemacolor Company of America has been presenting the Durbar in Kinemacolor at the Forrest Theater, meeting with great success.

L. A. Graybell, of Clifton Forge, Va., has ordered a Powers No. 5 complete from the Calhuff Supply Company of Philadelphia.

Dante's "Inferno" in moving pictures, shown to the public for the first time here at the Chestnut Street Opera House, proved to be a spectacle conceived and executed on a grand scale. Seldom, if ever, have such elaborately and on the whole artistically posed scenes been reproduced on the screen; and never with so evenly sustained an effect. It is easy to believe that the work of setting and photographing required two years.

The city of Trenton, N. J., lost two of its most popular moving picture men within the past week by death. Joseph E. McCherg, of the Bijou Theater, and William LaMont, of the Mercer County Amusement Company. These two picture men were well known in this city, as they both made frequent trips here to visit the local film exchanges.

Janke & Mooney, builders, have purchased a lot of ground at the northwest corner of Germantown Avenue and Hunting Park Avenue, 176 by 108 feet, on part of which will they will build a motion picture theater capable of seating 2,000 persons. This theater when completed will be one of the largest houses in that section of the city.

T. J. Krodel, of the Columbia Moving Picture Company, of Columbia, Pa., spent a few days in this city last week, and witnessed the demonstration of the Simplex picture machine at the Calehuff Supply Company.

Harry Davis, of the Bijou Dream Theater, of Milton, Pa., is making his theater more attractive by building four new boxes, placing opera chairs in the present boxes and lowering the rail on the wings which contain the boxes. As soon as this is finished work will be begun on the construction of a ladies' waiting-room in the rear of the upper floor. This will contain mirrors, tables and chairs, and will be carpeted and papered and luxuriously furnished.

When all the alterations are completed, this theater will without a doubt be the finest picture house in the State, owing to the efforts of Mr. Davis, who is wide awake to all the new features.

T. E. Franklin, of the Palace Theater, of Hagerstown, Md., was in the city part of the week and reports that the picture business is going at a fair rate in that city, although he says that a larger business would be a blessing to the picture men in that section.

Of recent years the cinematograph shows have made great strides in public favor in China until now almost every port can boast of at least one theater and many of five or six.

The International Films Company, of Camden, N. J., has been incorporated with a capital of $14,000. The object of this company is to manufacture, buy, sell and lease films.

Grover C. Hastings, of Bethlehem, Pa., has bought a Model (B) Edison complete with Edison transformer, sold by the Calehuff Supply Company, of Philadelphia.

J. E. Robin, of the Precision Machine Company, of New York, who has been demonstrating the Simplex picture machine, has left for Boston, where he will boom the Simplex. The Philadelphia operators were much pleased with the machine he had at the Calehuff Supply Company, and were strong in their praise of the different features.

THE NEW COMET

Release Days, Monday and Saturday

The New Comet company has not been sleeping—Oh, no!—not for a second. We have been very much awake. From the 4th of January to April 15th we had our stock company at Jacksonville, Fla., taking pictures with which to fortify ourselves when the inevitable crash came. We were prepared to meet it, no matter which way the wind blew. We had more than a score of negatives on hand, all high-class in every respect, and, after all, the man with the A-1 pictures is the winner in the film game every time. THANHOUSER, FOR EXAMPLE. While our Southern company was doing big things at Jacksonville, our New York headquarters were being reorganized and remodelled from stem to stern. Nothing was left of the old Yankee outfit (which the Comet succeeded) but the four walls. The studio has been converted into the newest and best equipped motion picture gallery in America. For up-to-date cinematograph apparatus THERE ISN'T A FACTORY IN THE WORLD that surpasses the COMET'S newly built plant. The office staff, all factory employees and studio experts were selected with the greatest care. When Mr. William Steiner retired, every member of the "old guard" found new fields as well. To-day the COMET stands on the pictures it is now releasing. Get acquainted with the following winners and see for yourself.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 3rd

MY WIFE'S BIRTHDAY

(1,000 Feet)

One of the Jacksonville comedies. It's a scream from the main-title to the trailer. You cannot complain about the scarcity of good comedies when "corkers" of this kind are being turned out.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 8th

THE ISLE OF STRIFE—(Cuba)

(1,000 Feet)

Showing fifteen scenes of Cuba's most important points of interest, including MORRO CASTLE, HAVANA HARBOR, selected spots in HAVANA city, the arrest by Rural Guards of INSURRECTOS and the trial of same in a Cuban Court House. A Sugar Plantation in full operation, making one of the best industrials in many a day.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 10th

THE PRICE OF DECEIT

(910 Feet—Dramatic)

A squabble in domestic life that fairly lifts you out of your seat. Made by the COMET'S Western company. Watch for the Comet's Western every Monday.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 15th

AN INTERRUPTED WEDDING

(1,000 Feet)

A comedy that is full of snap, bang and go. Taken by the Comet's entire Southern company in their happiest mood.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 22nd

THE TALE OF A RUBBER BOOT

(1,000 Feet)

A crackerjack comedy that is not without its pretty little heart touches as well. This picture contains several surprises and will make many friends for the new Comet pictures.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 29th

WANETA'S SACRIFICE

(985 Feet—Dramatic)

A Western masterpiece in motion pictures. A thrill is in store for you when you see this reel. By all means read the COMET'S synopses each week and keep in touch with the output of the most up-to-date film-makers in New York.

One-sheet posters for each release—Sold only through Film Supply Co. of America.
If you are not getting COMET literature, send us your name and we'll attend to it.

A unique exhibition in motion pictures will be offered at the Garrick Theater, with two performances daily, in which Captain Kleinschmidt will present views of his experiences during the Carnegie Museum Alaskan-Siberian expedition last summer. These pictures were taken at a great risk, as the animals photographed were at times not more than ten feet away from the camera.

Among the interesting scenes is a terrific fight between a polar bear and walrus, and other pictures of marked interest.

Al Botterf has purchased a No. 5 Powers complete with a model B gas-making outfit for use at the Pennsylvania State College, at State College, Pa. The Calehuff Supply Company furnished the machine.

The Bell Moving Picture Company, of Reading, Pa., are admitting free the pupils of the schools of the northeastern section of the city. One school attends each day, Saturday excepted. The pupils are in charge of teachers and mostly educational pictures are shown.

The first annual sacred concert and dance given by the Motion Picture Operators' Union on Sunday, May 12, was a marked success. There were about 800 persons in attendance and the New Garrick Hall was taxed to its capacity.

The Ball Committee with Walter G. Murry, chairman, Wm. Royal, secretary, and Lou Krouse, treasurer, with the able assistance of several other members of the Union brought the affair off without a hitch.

The Refreshment Committee, composed of Edward Abram, John Hughes, George Gorman and John A. Harris, had their end of the program worked right up to perfection and no one complained of not having the desired amount of refreshing dishes.

A large number of the members worked for the entertaining end, and it was surprising the amount of talent that was there; some of the members pulled off acts like old timers, and perhaps they were, but they would say nothing about that end of it. John Dougherty, president of the Union, had the most popular act, which was Irish, including a song and dance. Several of the film exchanges donated films. It is now understood that this will be an annual affair, and the members will all work to make each event much better than the precious one.

The William Penn High School Alumni enjoyed a very pleasant evening at the Majestic Hotel watching a production of moving pictures projected by William Kamp, of the Calehuff Supply Company.

Brown & Savage, of the Elite Amusement Company, of Atlantic City, purchased a Model B Edison complete for their new house, the Princess, at Ocean City, N. J., from the Calehuff Supply Company.

CLEMENT H. CONGDON.

NEW ENGLAND.

IN a recent issue of the World, the present writer gave out some inside information regarding the million dollar theater proposed for Scollay Square, Boston. The writer stated that the theater would extend to Bowdoin Square, which was a slip of the pen. It is, of course, impossible for any building to front on Scollay Square and to extend around to Bowdoin Square—Howard Street being the only place possible for any building of the kind outlined at that time. Affairs are becoming quite interesting on this proposition, all arising from the fact that the lessee of a piece of property very much needed to build the theater, refuses to sell. This man operates a prosperous restaurant, with about 3 years' lease to his credit. He told the writer that he was somewhat at odds with the promoters, owing to the fact that they had tried "to put one over on me," to use the exact words. It seems that he had been approached by the promoters, who showed him plans—not for a theater, but for a Turkish bath. The restaurant keeper found the trick out before he had signed off, and then promptly raised his asking price. Two doors from his restaurant is a store which is now being made ready for occupancy; strange to relate, it is another restaurant that is about to tempt fate. The restaurant keeper remarked to the writer that it was these same theatrical men who were now changing their business to that of restaurant keepers and further remarked that they were trying to freeze him out, in order to get the lease. "On the day the restaurant is opened my bonus price for my lease goes up just $10,000," and "the way I feel now I won't sell out at all." This information is absolutely authentic and will come as news to many in Boston, as the "soft pedal" is kept over the moves made in this deal.

Rumor has it that the Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, is dickering with Lander's Restaurant, with a view to giving up their Premier Theater, Washington Street, Boston. As these columns have stated, the Premier has not been doing much of anything, and this has been especially true since Gordon's Olympic Theater opened nearby. The Premier has reduced its admission price to 5 cents, and runs Independent pictures and songs.

The National Theater, Boston, one of the B. F. Keith theaters, changed its policy of vaudeville and pictures on May 27, when a cabaret show was established. The theater will now be known as the National Theater Gardens, and was closed the week of May 19 while decoratore are preparing the house. The orchestra chairs will be removed and tables installed. Two performances will be given daily and refreshments will be served. This is the first theater in Boston to try this policy. The house will change back to vaudeville and pictures in the fall, according to present reports.

On May 27-29 inclusive Mr. Seymour H. Stone, secretary of the Boston Association for the Relief and Control of Tuberculosis, lectured at the Star Theater, Boston. These lectures, accompanied with colored slides, are given free and should do much good. These lectures are to be given in many of the Boston photoplay houses.

Messrs. Gibson, Lowe and Dame have formed a corporation to build a theater to seat about 900 at Clinton, Mass. The theater will be located on High Street, and should be ready about September 15. Clinton can easily stand a first class house, as the town is shy on photoplay theaters.

Gordon's new Olympia Theater, Boston, is doing a big business, as it well deserves, being one of the finest theaters in this country, playing vaudeville and pictures. The Globe Theater, nearby, formerly a "legitimate" theater, but now playing vaudeville and pictures, may reduce its price to 10 cents, in order to meet the Olympia's strong competition. This new house is making the going pretty tough for nearby houses, even though one proprietor stated that his house was doing better than ever since the Olympia opened. This remark raised a general laugh at the General Film Company's office, where it was "sprung."

Mr. George Copeland, of the Scenic Theater, East Boston, Mass., kindly donated his theater for a benefit performance given for Mr. George Morrison on May 26. Mr. Morrison was formerly manager of the Scenic, but left for Colorado because of ill health.

It will take the Supreme Court to settle the row in Woburn, Mass., between the city officials and the managers of the Lcyeum and Walnut Street Theaters, both photoplay houses. In a petition filed this week, J. S. McGann, J. B. McGann and J. H. Flynn, co-partners in the two theaters, seek to have a "writ of prohibition" issued against Judge Littlefield, restraining him from taking notice of a complaint now pending, in which it is alleged that the petitioners are operating the Woburn houses without a license. The managers say they have a license; good until August 1, 1912, issued them by the chief of district police. Late in April, Mayor Murray notified the managers that to use the theaters it was necessary for them to obtain a license from him, under Revised Laws, Chapter 102, Sec. 172. They asked for one, but were refused. The managers stopped giving shows temporarily, but on legal advice opened up on May 4. The managers have engaged the services of Mr. P. H. Kelly, who promises a finish fight on the matter.

Messrs. Hatch, Reed and Fisher report a most favorable opening for their new Newton Opera House, near Nonantum Square, Newton, Mass. The house is first class in every way, seating about 1,000 people, and plays vaudeville and photoplays.

Mr. Cook, operating a theater in Northampton, Mass., under his own name, closed his house owing to the fact that the premises have been leased for other purposes. Mr. Cook expects to have a new house soon and Ware, Mass., may be the town, if the deal can be put through.

Starting Thursday evening, May 23, the motion pictures of the Durbar in Kinemacolor have been exhibited at Tremont Temple, Boston. This hall has proved a very good place for moving pictures of unusual merit. The Kinemacolor pictures of the Coronation remained there several months and did a land office business.

Manager William Stevens, of Keith's Theater, Lowell, Mass., has cut out his former programs, and photoplays and illustrated songs are to be the future policy of this house.

Manager W. E. Spragg, of the Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., has made ready for summer by eliminating the vaudeville acts from his programs. Straight pictures and songs are given.

The Rainey African Hunt pictures have ended a week of fair business at the Park Theater, Boston. The pictures are so unusual and interesting that they deserve even better patronage than was accorded them at the Park.

The new Lincoln Theater, Worcester, Mass., which has been so long building on Elm Street, is now nearly finished, and will be ready for business by September.

According to Mr. R. F. Eichler, Waltham, Mass., will soon have a brand new moving picture theater, located on Crescent Street, with a large seating capacity. Waltham could stand a first-class house, such as is proposed.

Manager Moore, of Keith's Theater, Portland, Me., has played his final week of vaudeville and pictures for this season. A stock company has been installed over the summer.

Manager Waltoff states that his Orpheum Theater, Savin Rock, near New Haven, Conn., was ready for its opening on May 20, when vaudeville and Independent pictures are to be given. This theater is brand new and modern in every way, with a seating capacity of 1,500. Two performances will be given daily, with a bi-weekly change of program.

Manager Kelliman, of the Victoria Theater, Lawrence, Mass., scored a beat over his competitors when he secured "Camille" for the week of May 13. Business rose splendidly for this attraction.

The moving picture interests of Northampton, Mass., got together this week and marched up to the offices of the City Council. This committee complains that the license fee in Northampton is too large, and asked for a consideration of the matter, with a view to lowering the amount of the fee.

Meriden, Conn., will have plenty of open air theaters, playing pictures and vaudeville, as both the Star Airdome and the Meriden Airdome are about to open. Messrs. Pinder and Rudloff, managers of the Meriden Airdome, have made many alterations and general improvements and have a first-class theater.

Now that Marcus Loew's South End Theater, Boston, Mass., has closed for the season, Mr. Louis M. Boas, who had charge of that house, has gone back to Fall River, Mass. The Academy of Music, playing vaudeville and pictures, another Loew theater, is now under Mr. Boas' care. Mr. Charles L. Bensen, who had been managing the Academy and Premier theaters, will now give all his time to the latter house.

The photoplay fans of Portland, Maine, have had plenty of high-class pictures to enjoy, as Manager James Greely, of the New Portland Theater, exhibited "Camille" with Sarah Bernhardt, while Manager I. H. Mosher, of the Big Nickle attracted the better class of trade with "Mme. Sans-Gene." Most pleasing reports have been given as to their pulling powers, and many New England houses have decided to feature these reels.

Frank S. Terrell has been chosen as manager of the new photoplay theater which just opened at New Haven, Conn. This house seats about 1,200, and is owned by Frank Wilcox. A straight program of Independent pictures and songs is the policy.

Lovell A. Mitchell, manager of the moving picture house bearing his name, at New Haven, Conn., has opened his house with Licensed pictures and songs. The house seats about 1,200, and expects to do a nice business.

Mr. H. Birkes, of Lancaster, N. H., is thinking of building a photoplay theater in his city, to be located in the Exchange Hotel building.

Manager Shields, formerly manager of the Magic Theater, Fort Dodge, Iowa, has accepted an executive position with the Poli Theaters, New Gordon's Olympia Theater, Boston's latest popular priced vaudeville and picture house, opened to the public at 1 o'clock, May 6. The Olympia is on Washington Street, opposite Boylston Street, on a portion of the John H. Tracey Estate, and is in the very heart of the business district. The Olympia was designed by C. H. Blackall, the foremost architect in the city, and is called the "House with the Moving Stairs," because fast moving escalators carry patrons to all parts of the house. The house seats 2,500, and runs Licensed pictures. A complete, detailed story of the theater, together with photographs, will be published in a forthcoming issue of The Moving Picture World.

Warren, R. I., became unusually animated recently when Harry Whitney set sail from that city on a sealing expedition. Mr. Whitney carried with him a full line of apparatus for the taking of moving pictures of his trip. Mr. Whitney hopes to bring back with him a series of motion pictures that will show seal-hunting in great detail, and has on board many thousands of feet of raw film for this purpose.

Mr. John Koen, the popular picture man of Salem, Mass., reports that work is now well along in the erection of his new Comique Theater, located on Washington and Federal Streets, Salem. Manager Koen hopes to be open by the latter part of the summer, when he will own a theater second to none in his vicinity. The new house will seat about 1,400, and will be of brick construction, and thoroughly fireproof. A balcony is planned for the house. Mr. Koen will not have to work up a trade, as everyone in Salem knows the sort of programs the Old Comique used to offer, and, with his greatly increased seating capacity, Mr. Koen should capture about all the business in his town.

The Opera House, Westerly, R. I., reports good business with a straight program of photoplays, as does the Star Theater, managed by Mr. C. Cowan, who uses a little vaudeville with his photoplays.

The Jolliette Theater, Bowdoin Square, Boston, closed this week, and, according to the very general report, will not reopen. Business has been poor at this house. No better example of the great importance of good management can be cited. The Jolliette always showed a good profit when managed by Mr. Joe Roth, but the house went steadily downward after it was sold, and Mr. Roth left. The Olympic, just across the street from the Jolliette, had never even paid expenses, until Mr. Roth's concern bought it from the original owners. From that time on the methods of Manager Roth showed plainly, and the case was just reversed. The Olympic is a winner to-day, while the Jolliette had to close its doors. Mr. Roth might be too modest to tell us these things himself, but the facts are true, and it is not at all too much to state that as a manager, mighty few men in New England are in his class. Mr. Roth is "putting it across" all the while, and his box-office proves it.

There seems to be something wrong with Marcus Loew's South End Theater, Boston. The house ran the usual brand of Loew vaudeville and pictures this winter, but did not seem to make a very big killing. Last month the policy was changed to stock company attractions. Rumor has it that the stock shows are not meeting with much success, and that the South End is due to close for a time. Evidently even Marcus Loew can pick a lemon!

A rather interesting report resulting from the investigations of a committee of ten members of the Children's Welfare League of Roxbury, Mass., has been made. These investigators have made a thorough and careful study of the moving picture shows in the Roxbury district, with a view to determining what effect photoplays and vaudeville performances of the type now being given, have upon children. Miss Helen P. Kempton has submitted her report, which finds both good and bad qualities. However, they found more bad than good (as is usually the way of self-made investigators). The report remarked something about "a great need exists for a higher and more wholesome entertainment, especially for children who are found neglecting their books and lessons for the more exciting life depicted in the films." Although not the exact wording, the foregoing exactly gives the meaning. The committee did not fail to suggest a plan which would overcome these "distressing facts," which is as follows:—It is proposed that a Saturday afternoon matinee be given, especially adapted to the tastes and needs of school children, and that teachers from various schools should make specific suggestions as to what films should be used. The report stated that, should the managers be persuaded to arrange these matinees, teachers, settlement workers and religious societies, would unite to advertise the shows, and urge children to attend. This idea is not at all bad; in fact, it is worthy of the serious consideration of the Roxbury theaters. If they could get this sort of intimate co-operation from such bodies, it would well repay them to run this special performance each week. More than that, it probably would mean more business on week days, as these societies exert some influence among the public. At so little trouble and cost, it would seem good judgment to give the idea a trial. As to the neglect of school duties by some pupils (due to the photoplay, of course), that is the usual thing, and it embodies in the reports of nearly all investigations. It might be remarked that, from the beginning of things, school failed to appeal to every pupil, and that "hooky" was in a most flourishing condition before moving pictures were ever dreamed of. However, taken as a class, this report was not nearly so narrow, and so prejudiced, as others we have seen, and the suggestion given above, more than made up for the few unfounded and foolish things the report contained. Any report that offers a constructive plan to offset the destructive things alleged to have been discovered, is worthy of consideration. Most reports only tear down, but don't concern themselves with the most important business of finding a way out of the difficulty.

The Marquiese Theater of Lawrence, Mass., playing a straight photoplay program, was sold at auction.

Bass Point, Nahant, Mass., will soon be in full swing for the summer season. The Relay Theater will open with Independent pictures, under the management of Mr. Asher. Mr. A. Fuller, owner of the Theatorium, also at Bass Point, will open his house, and will probably use Licensed service. During the season, both houses do very well.

Mr. Charles Cherry, assistant manager of the Star Theater, Boston, will soon be back at his post, after an enforced vacation, due to illness. Mr. Cherry's faithful work and efficiency stood him in good stead, and his position is held open for him until he will have recovered completely. Manager Appleby has been doing double duty, in order to hold the position open for his assistant.

The Scenic Theater, Revere Beach, Mass., is to be under the management of Mr. Charles W. Sheafe this summer. Mr. Sheafe recently sold his Majestic Theater, Keene, N. H., to Mr. D. P. Alden. Mr. Sheafe is one of the old-time exhibitors, as he formerly had a theater in Lynn, Mass.

The Dreamland Theater, also of Keene, N. H., was recently sold to R. P. Spencer, who will continue to show Licensed pictures and illustrated songs.

Since James H. Donovan has taken hold of the managerial duties at the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., business has picked up swiftly, with photoplays and songs as the attractions. All of which only proves that good management can turn the tide. Manager Donovan knows his business from A to Z, as he formerly had a house in Woonsocket, R. I. A touch of sensation will be a balloon ascension in front of the Central Square Theater, by C. C. Bonette. This should bring crowds to the lobby.

The Comique and Palace Theaters, Boston, Mass., ran the Sarah Bernhardt pictures of "Camille," while the Premier featured "Sans-Gene," during the week of May 6. Business was reported fairly brisk.

Manager James W. Greely, of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Me., also featured "Camille" during the week of May 6.

After a successful engagement, the Milano production of Homer's "Odyssey" completed its stay at Tremont Temple, Boston, on May 11. With prices considerably advanced, the reels played to excellent returns.

Manager John Sheehan, of the Park Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., reports very good business with vaudeville and a daily change of photoplays.

Floating Bridge Park, near Lynn, Mass., will open the end of this month with a program of Vaudeville and pictures as one of the main attractions in the rustic theater, which will be managed by J. F. Horgan.

Woburn, Mass., is a very small town, but seems to be plenty large enough to have a full-sized moving picture tangle. Mr. John T. Watt, of Woburn, formerly held the lease of Lyceum Hall, where he gave programs of photoplays and illustrated songs, but, in some way, the lease was acquired by Mr. John McGann. After getting the lease, Mr. McGann applied to Mayor H. D. Murray for a license to operate a moving picture theater. This boon was refused Mr. McGann, who, nevertheless, decided to run his shows without a license. Manager McGann advertised that he would run two shows on Saturday, May 4, and had a jammed house, as the whole town knew that there was a mix-up. It is said that Mr. McGann has lived in Woburn only one year, while Mr. Watt is an old-time Woburnite. The shows came off as advertised, and Mayor Murray and Chief of Police McDermott are threatening trouble, although no action has been taken as yet. Excitement reigns supreme in Woburn.

The Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., closed for the season, after ten months of very pleasing business. The house will reopen with the same programs of vaudeville and photoplays.

The summer parks controlled by J. W. Gorman, and situated all over New England, will not play vaudeville and pictures this season, according to present reports. Stock company attractions will be tried out.

The Casino Theater, Providence, R. I., has a new manager in the person of Mr. C. H. Williams, of Lawrence, Mass. Mr. Williams is very well known, and has had a lot of experience as manager of moving picture houses. The Casino is doing very well, with programs of straight pictures and songs.

As was stated, the proprietors of the Orpheum Theater, Newburyport, Mass., are in bankruptcy. The owners have now made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors, and will come before the court on a petition for involuntary bankruptcy.

HENRY.

ST. LOUIS.

The Hamilton Skydome, as it is called, said to be the largest open airdome in the country, and seating 4,000 people, opened the season May 4 with a record-breaking attendance.

Safe blowers were foiled in an attempt to rob the picture house of George Dubois, 913 Franklin Avenue, by the failure of a set of drills they were using on the lock. Entrance was gained by forcing a rear door.

The Orpheum, 5900 Easton, has closed its doors for the season. The house, under the able management of Gra. Weller, pulled through a very stormy winter career in the face at heavy competition.

Frank R, Talbot, owner of the Hippodrome and the Gem Theaters here, has obtained an option on the property at 6th and Market Streets, now occupied by the Blanke-Wenneker Candy Company and purposes building the largest hippodrome house in the country. To Mr. Talbot in a great measure is due the credit of making 6th Street known as the "White Way" of St. Louis. Daring, energetic, and resourceful, he is rated the ablest man in theatrical enterprises that St. Louis has known "these many moons."

The present crusade instituted by the St. Louis Star, a local paper, tending toward the elimination of suggestive acts by "would-be vaudevillians," is meeting with public approval.

It is felt that the usual run of American made releases of film subjects supervised by the National Board of Censorship leaves but little ground for censure respecting morality, but that a few foreign makes could be toned down a bit on their "spicy tendencies" to meet the eyes of a goodly number of young Americans who find innocent enjoyment in clean pictures.

The return of Miss Florence Turner to the Vitagraph and Miss Lawrence to the Independents is hailed with delight by local devotees of the "movies" in St. Louis, where both young women number their admirers by the thousands.

F. J. FEGAN.

PITTSBURGH.

This city's motion picturedom, as well as the officers and members of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, are looking forward with great expectancy toward the convention to be held here on June 24 and 25. Letters and circulars have been mailed broadcast throughout this state, as well as neighboring states, inviting all loyal yeomen of moving picturedom to this important conclave. With the facilities to be found in this city for accommodation and with the enthusiasm of all Pittsburghians to show visitors Pittsburgh-as-she-is, a royal good time is assured to all visitors. The initial meeting and banquet will be held in the most prominent hotel in this city, and a similar treat will be extended by the H. J. Heinz Co. in their big auditorium, where it is whispered, there will be entertainment in 57 ways as well as 57 dishes. A river excursion, as well as a "Seeing Pittsburgh" trip, will also add to the gayety of the occasion. A visit to one of the largest steel mills in the world, as well as to other mills, will probably be a feature. Other unique and various innovations have been planned by the officers of the league.

As this conclave will be held mainly as a meeting for the election of delegates to the general convention at Chicago in August, as well as for the ratification of the many organizations throughout the state, it will be to the interest of all moving picture men and women to be here on this occasion.

Mr. H. A. Lande, former president of the Pittsburgh Photoplay Co. of this city, was a visitor at the offices of both the Independent and Pittsburgh Photoplay Exchanges. Messrs. Davis and Miller, managers of these exchanges, extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Lande. While in town Mr. Lande made a tour of Pittsburgh picture houses, and was heartily greeted everywhere by his numerous friends. Mr. Max W. Herring, the proprietor of the Red Mill Theater of Wilkensburg, and Mr. Lee Jack Warner, its manager, accompanied him in seeing the sights. Mr. Warner, who is a brother of the Abe Warner of Warner's Features, is a competent chauffeur as well as entertainer, so that his presence was imperative.

Among the successful users of the Independent Film Exchange service, The Lyric of Carnegie, claims comment. The Lyric is situated in the very heart of Carnegie's business district, and is considered one of the neatest little photoplay emporiums in Western Pennsylvania. The seating capacity is 300, with standing room for about 100 more. The projection room is in the hands of a competent operator-electrician, who prides himself in not having had a breakdown in the last three months. The owner-manager is Mr. W. M. Keane, formerly with Mr. McConnel at the Park Theater, Butler Street.

Mr. J. W. Mercer, second vice-president of the Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, is the manager-owner of a protoplay house in Monaca—about a stone's throw from this city. This little theater has a seating capacity of about 300 seats, is equipped with two No. 6 Powers machines.

The Reliable, Midvale, is in competent hands, and is really a very nice little theater. It has a seating capacity of 236. Mr. Thomas Barbin, the treasurer of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, is the manager and owner.

McKee's Theater, on Arlington Street, St. Clair's Borough, is still enjoying the full horn of prosperity. The theater is packed almost to the doors daily. The seating capacity is 360, with a lot of room for the regular S. R. O. patrons. The projection department is in the hands of Harry McKee, the son of Oliver McKee, the manager and owner.

The busiest men in moving picturedom for a couple of weeks will be Messrs. Harry E. Reiff and Henry Poke. All the trials and tribulations of being on the entertainment committee for the coming convention have fallen to the lot of these two gentlemen. Since they are hustlers of renown, the success of the conclave is doubly assured.

The Ideal Photoplay Co., of which Thomas B. Cowan of Monessen, is general manager, has purchased of Mr. Henry Loutlit, the property upon which the Ideal Theater is at present, and it is expected to enlarge and remodel this theater into the most modern photoplay and vaudeville house in Western Pennsylvania. The officers of the Ideal Photoplay Co. are Messrs. Thos. B. Cowan, George Moore and H. E. Shibler. This concern is now having plans drawn up by Mr. George Yohe, the local architect, for a new theater in Donora, upon which work is expected to begin on the first of June. The concern now owns the Bijou, Monessen, Ideal, Monongahela, Star at Chasleroi, as well as the Star at Donora.

The Pathe and Gaumont cameramen will be on hand here June 24 and 25, to take moving pictures of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' convention for their respective gazettes.

EDDIE WHEELER.

INDIANAPOLIS.

THE Indianapolis Moving Picture Managers' Association has began a legal attack on a recent ordinance forbidding the attendance of any child under fourteen years of age unless accompanied by a parent or guardian, or a person more than twenty-one years old, having the written consent of parent or guardian, at any moving picture, vaudeville or burlesque theater. The ordinance also prohibits any child under fourteen from performing in such a theater, except traveling professionals. Dr. J. M. Rhodes, of the association, in order to test the ordinance, admitted a young boy, and was arrested by arrangement with the police.

The Central Film Service Company has leased a building at 113 and 115 West Georgia Street. On the third floor the company will install a model moving picture theater for the exhibition of films and supplies to its customers. Joseph H. Spellmier, of Indianapolis, is president of the company, and A. A. Schmidt, of Buffalo, N. Y., was recently elected vice-president, and has come to Indianapolis to become general manager of the company.

A company known as the California Auto-Foto Company has been organized at Sullivan and will manufacture an automatic motion picture machine. The company has been incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $100,000. Those interested in the company are Alonzo C. Owens, Hinkle S. Hays, Etta Jewell, Charles Snavely, and Arthur W. Snavely.

O. G. Murray, owner of two theaters in Richmond, and manager of several vaudeville houses in Indiana and Ohio, will erect a new motion picture theater in Richmond. He has organized the Murray Theater Co., which has been incorporated with $10,000 capitalization, others interested in the enterprise being Ottie M. Murray and Abbie E. Urban.

Charles F. Woods, owner of the Star Theater in Princeton, has leased a large brick livery barn in that city, which will be modeled into a motion picture theater, with a seating capacity of 750.

Films and supplies will be handled by the Central State Rights Co., which has been organized in this city by Max Flaskamp, A. T. Porter and E. A. Cooper, and which has been incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $10,000.

Edward Cohen, of Cincinnati, Ohio, has recently purchased The Wayne Motion Picture Theater in Fort Wayne Avenue, this city.

A motion picture theater will be established at Muncie by the Consolidated Amusement Company, in which R. H. Cannan, L. H. Dunmyer, and T. C. Lacy are interested.

The newly organized Crystal Entertainment Co. will establish a motion picture theater at Anderson. The company has been incorporated with $5,000 capital by M. M. Stephens, H. K. Schwindler and O. W. Crull.

CLARENCE L. CUMMINS.

LOUISVILLE.

IT is surprising to note the strength of the feature film in local territory. A couple of months ago real features were few and far between. Now-a-days it is indeed a slow-going playhouse which does not exploit at least one special release per week, with all the allurements of exclusive state rights for the production. This trend of the trade plainly indicates a tendency to give the public what it wants in the way of the best pictures on the broadest possible scale.

A mishap in the course of erection of the new Ideal Theater at Tyenty-sixth and Market Streets in this city, has made it imperative for its builders to hustle if they wish to have the work completed on scheduled time, by July 1. In the street, just in front of the new theater's location, the municipal authorities have been busy setting a sewer. The work of excavating just in front of the house caused the forward end of the foundation to settle, cracking the front wall badly. It is now necessary to repair this crack, and it is estimated that the damage done will amount to $1,000 or so, while it is now incumbent upon the builders to rush the erection of the house with all possible speed. The Ideal is to be opened July 1, with appropriate celebrations. It is owned by the Broadway Amusement Company, and will be one of the unique, as well as one of the most elaborate structures of its kind in the Falls Cities.

It has been announced by the Falls Cities Amusement Company, that plans for a new house to be operated by that concern in New Albany, Ind., just across the Ohio river from Louisville, are now being drawn. "We are contracting with the owners of the Tavern Hotel in New Albany, for certain arrangements regarding the property that we propose to place next to that hostlery, and work upon a $30,000 hotel for New Albany will probably begin in the near future," said Michael Switow, president of the Falls Cities Company, to a representative of the Moving Picture World.

The Broadway Amusement Company, it is announced, is definitely planning extension into territory across the river from Louisville. The Broadway Company, one of the best-known concerns of its kind in the Gateway City, is now ambitiously planning to embark into the field in New Albany and Jeffersonville, Ind., establishing handsome houses in each of these cities. Details of the company's arrangements are not yet forthcoming, however.

A. H. Schafer, who for several years has owned and operated the Gem Theater in Jeffersonville, Ind., is preparing to extend his interests and will probably be ready to announce plans for his establishment of a branch enterprise for himself in New Albany, Ind., in the near future.

The Majestic Theater, according to the report of Louis J. Dittmar, has no complaint to make. A feature film which rivalled the famous "Zigomar" in point of business-producing, was "The Coming of Columbus," a notable Selig release which was awarded to Mr. Dittmar and his associates in this city by the Motion Picture Patent Company, of New York City.

Gaumont and Imp reels are advocated by the Falls Cities Amusement Company as being of the first water in point of attractiveness for their Fourth avenue house, the Novelty. Business is developing steadily at the Novelty, according to Manager Jacobstein, and no untoward turns in trade are to be anticipated for a long time.

The Cherokee Theater, owned by Derr Brothers, on Market Street, in this city, is still closed by sheriff's writ of attachment issued against its owners to satisfy a small claim held against them by the Majestic Theater Company. Settlement of the matter involving the two theatrical concerns is expected in the near future.

George A. Bleich, the owner of a couple of prosperous moving picture theaters in Western Kentucky, visited Cadiz from his headquarters in Hopkinsville last week. Mr. Bleich, in the interests of outside capital, is now completing plans for the establishment of a handsome photoplay house in Cadiz, which will be operated in connection with his other properties.

The Amuzu, in Middlesboro, Ky., is doing the finest business of its career. The Middlesboro exhibitors featured "The Bounder," an Eclair release telling of life in Mexico, with wonderful success during a week of excellent photoplay weather.

The Cincinnati Buckeye Film Company, of Cincinnati, O., has added a new Kentucky house to its list of patrons. The Cincinnati film lessees are now furnishing high-grade releases to the Alice Theater in Greenville, Ky., and the patronage of the Greenville house has expressed its appreciation of the innovation.

The officials in charge of the public schools of Paducah, Ky., have decided to adopt the moving picture for educational purposes, just as it is recommended by scholastic authorities in other cities. When the schools of Paducah open their fall terms in September, it is announced, an up-to-date picture machine will be available for any teacher in the system, to be used in illustrating historical, geographical, botanical and many other courses. Paducah will be one of the first cities in the Bluegrass state to advocate the moving picture in its new sphere.

T. L. McNutt, of the Unique Theater, in Mayfield, Ky., has completed negotiations with the owners of a brick business block on the corner of Eighth Street and Broadway in that city, and a portion of this property is to be remodeled at once for use as a photoplay theater of the most approved type.

It is reported that a moving picture theater in Dalton, Ga., the name of which is not given in the despatch, has inaugurated a phenomenally unique plan of selling itself to a new owner willy-nilly. The owners of the property have tired of its advantages, or disadvantages, and now propose to give it away, lock, stock and barrel, to some lucky customer. Accordingly, a date has been set for raffling off the property. It is announced that each entrance ticket purchased between now and that date entitles the holder to a chance in the drawing and—well, before long some august citizen of Dalton will find himself promoted to the position of a moving picture exhibitor when he never before dreamed of such a contingency.

Anthony Sudekum, manager of the Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., and one of the best-known exhibitors in the state, has purchased an up-to-date moving picture camera which is fitted for making all sorts of exposures. By way of trial, Manager Sudekum and his confrere, H. J. Furlong, of the Fifth Avenue Theater, stripped to boxing regalia and worked a few lively rounds before the lens. The film was developed and showed perfectly, coming up to the expectations of its makers in every respect. Accordingly, Mr. Sudekum et al propose to be ready to snap any current events of interest in the Tennessee capital in time to come.

The Kentucky Feature Film Exchange, having closed its showings of a couple of Warner features bearing upon the "Titanic" disaster, is now preparing to introduce "Redemption," another Warner 3-reel production, which is listed as one of the leaders in the motion picture world. "Redemption" is acted by practically the same cast which handled "Zigomar," and the Kentucky Exchange officials predict that it will be even more of a winner than the notable detective play. It is probable, although not certain, that "Redemption" will open at Hopkins' Theater, one of the local houses supplied by the feature release concern.

The Falls Cities Amusement Company has opened The Highland, one of the handsomest residential showhouses in this territory. The Highland is not an airdome, but is an accredited suburban photoplay house, equipped to accommodate good-sized audiences and finished in the most approved manner. It was opened only a week or so ago, with a standard program of Falls City Amusement Company offerings, and has been going at a rate of business which promises to establish it immediately as an institution in the local field.

The Kentucky Derby of 1912, the classic of the American turf, is not to be without honor in the moving picture world. Moving picture photographers, equipped with suitable apparatus and in charge of Alf Oldham, formerly a well-known horse owner, snapped the gala crowd while waiting for the barrier to snap. The race, furlong by furlong, with Worth flashing across the wire, winning by a head from Duval, is shown in the reels prepared by Mr. Oldham. What disposition is to be made of the pictures has not been definitely announced.

Henry Reiss, of the Broadway Amusement Company, has returned from Chicago with plans for an unique lighting system for the Ideal Theater, a handsome new Broadway house which is to be opened in the West End about July 1. The Ideal, according to the plans of its owners, is to be one out of the multitude of local showhouses to be absolutely without exterior lighting affixed to the building itself. Sufficient distinction for the house is to be provided in the erection of four handsome lighting standards along the pavement in front of it. Each of the standards is to bear a cluster of magnifying lamps providing illumination four times the strength of the standard city arc light. It is believed that this unusual arrangement will be very effective in stamping the Ideal as being different, and in producing business accordingly.

The Novelty Theater, according to an official of the Falls Cities Amusement Company, is doing fine business day in and day out. First-run Gaumont releases are making good with Novelty audiences, according to House Manager Jacobstein.

NEW-YORK TRIBUNE.

DESERT PICTURES

Films Showing Garden of Allah Run Off at Century Theatre.

A private view of three thousand feet of motion picture films, showing Algiers and the journey south to the Garden of Allah, as well as the famous garden itself, was given yesterday morning at 11:30 o'clock at the Century Theatre.

The pictures were taken by J. Parker Read, jr., who left New York two months ago to make a motor trip through the Garden of Allah for the purpose of getting the best views possible of the scenes made known to the English-speaking world through the books of Robert Hichens, "The Garden of Allah" and "Barbary Sheep."

Starting with street scenes in Algiers, the pictures show the route taken from the coast to Biskra. They include many interesting incidents snapped en route, among which are several native dances. The views of the garden itself show, among other things, how faithful to the original the scenery of the play-spectacle which has just closed at the Century Theatre was.

The rights of the pictures were yesterday bought for several states in the Union.

NEW GERMAN THEATRE

ENDORSED BY THE N. Y. PRESS!

Information

This is the first advertisement placed, yet the rights to 9 States have already been sold.

It required traveling over 10,000 miles to secure this feature at great expense of autos, camera operators, guides, etc.

Ready for delivery with beautiful 1-, 3- or 8-sheet lithographs, lobby displays and advertising matter "de luxe."

This feature could command the highest of prices for State rights, yet wire us or write and you will find you can purchase your territory at a surprisingly low figure.

MELIES.

A WOMAN'S WAY (June 20).—The newly elected sheriff, having made several arrests, now confronts the hard problem of capturing a desperate bandit who is hiding on Devil's Rock. After posting a reward for his capture, she approaches his hiding place only to be ambushed by the bandit who severely injures her. The cowboys hurry her home and summon the doctor. Ruth, the sheriff's daughter, takes up the trail single-handed. She goes to a hut on the top of Devil's Rock Mountain, quietly opens the door and finds herself face to face with the notorious outlaw. With her pistol drawn, she arrests him. He removes his disguise and Ruth, to her horror, finds that he is Dick, her lover. Her sense of duty prevailing, she takes him to the village lock-up. At night, regretting her act, she steals the key from under her mother's pillow, and, intent upon releasing her lover, visits the prison. About to accede to the prayers of the prisoner to release him, she realizes the disgrace to her mother which would follow, and bidding her lover farewell, begs him to meet his fate like a man.

ECLIPSE.

MOTOR BOAT RACES (June 19).—"They're off!" is the cry from the excited spectators in the pleasure craft lining the course, and we soon witness these wonderful high speed boats in hair-raising contests. They skim the waters, propelled by powerful motors, and attain a marvelous speed. It is difficult to find a more thrilling contest than a motor boat race.

STUDIES OF FISH LIFE (June 19).—An instructive, as well as intensely interesting subject, showing many of the lower forms of fish life, such as: Pipe Fish, Sea Urchin, Pectern, Pollack, Swimming Crabs, Lug Worm, Brittle Stars, the Octopus, and many others.

BERGEN, NORWAY (June 19).—Bergen is the second city of importance in Norway, and contains many sights of unusual interest to tourists. The film shows a bird's-eye view of the harbor and fortress, scenes in and about the town, and concludes with a glorious picture of Lofetus, one of Norway's noted waterfalls.

KALEM.

THE BAG OF GOLD (June 17).—During the year 1838 the American brig "Danube" Was wrecked along the coast near San Pedro. One of the crew, Sam Prentiss, a hardy young American, managed to overcome the perils of the waves and reached the shore on a spar. Sam had carefully saved his earnings and carried a comfortable sum of gold money in his belt. He made his way to Los Angeles and after a somewhat adventurous career in that place, engaged in the fur business. He married Rafaela, daughter of Antonio Lugo, a prominent man in the growing pueblo. It was the influence of Lugo which shielded the young American when the latter's not always prudent actions were about to bring him serious trouble.

THE RUBE DETECTIVE (June 21).—Rube, learning through a newspaper advertisement that anyone can be taught to be a detective for $25.00, sends in his money and receives instruction. In following the directions of the detective school, Rube is arrested for being a general nuisance. That night burglars enter and rob the village post office. The town constable is at his wits' end to find the perpetrators of the crime and in despair at his helplessness, he decides to liberate Rube for the purpose of trailing the crooks. Rube is taken to the scene of the robbery and quickly finds valuable clues, namely, a piece of cheese and a broken package of fly paper. The amateur detective proceeds to emulate the example of Sherlock Holmes, and thanks to his private instructions, he eventually succeeds in capturing the burglars. He marches them back to the village store where he is proclaimed the "hero of the hour" and receives a handsome reward.

THE CHAUFFEUR'S DREAM (June 21).—Tom, the chauffeur, takes his employer, Mr. Bronson, to the train, and upon returning to the garage, writes a note to his friend, Dick, inviting him to go out for a joy ride. While the messenger is delivering the note, Tom falls asleep and his dreams depict a series of catastrophies which befall an unscrupulous chauffeur who takes liberties with his employer's machine. When Dick arrives to accept the invitation, Tom cannot shake off the effects of the vivid dream and retracts his offer, much to the disgust of his friend.

AN ARABIAN TRAGEDY (June 19).—Ayub Kashif, becomes embittered toward his wife, Fatima, because their union has been childless. He eventually determines to divorce Fatima and free her slave, whom he then will wed. Fatima, who still loves her husband, lives a life of sorrow, praying that her husband's love will return to her. A year later, Allah grants Ayub an heir. Fatima hearing of the event, writes Ayub, requesting that she be allowed to attend his wife as a slave. This request Ayub denies.

Four years later, Ayub, with a number of other merchants, departs to take rich merchandise across the desert. While on the journey he is attacked by a dread disease and, according to Turkish custom, it left to die.

Fatima, in her dreams, sees that her husband is about to perish. Haunted by the vision, she seeks the wife and begs her to send aid to the suffering Ayub. The former slave, caring only for her personal comfort, laughs at the discarded wife and Fatima, accompanied by two slaves, starts out in quest of Ayub. The fast failing merchant is digging his own grave when Fatima arrives after an exhausting journey across the burning sands of the desert and with a prayer that he be forgiven, Ayub dies in her arms.

BRONCHO BILLY'S GRATITUDE (June 18).—Dan Hart, a worthless good-for-nothing, takes the wedding ring from his wife's finger to pawn, and spends the money for drink, leaving a note saying he has given up all claim to her as his wife. Mrs. Hart takes her little girl and leaves for the West. A year later she is a school-teacher in Montana and happy in her new work. One evening she is washing the supper dishes when Broncho Billy, wounded and seeking concealment from the sheriff's posse, who are hunting him down for outlawry, staggers into the kitchen. Pitying him, Mrs. Hart bandages his wounded arm, gives him supper and protection for the night. Broncho and the little child are soon fast friends, and the "kid," as he calls her, romps with him until bedtime. Next morning Mrs. Hart leaves for the schoolhouse, with the little one, and Broncho, his heart full of gratitude for her kindness, starts down the trail. That afternoon Mrs. Hart is astonished when Dan, her husband, turns up at the house and demands that she return to him. She refuses and he forcibly takes the child and escapes down the trail, where he boards the stage-coach. An hour later Broncho holds up the stage and recognizes the child and Broncho forces him to release her, then allows the stage to go, unmolested. Outside the house Broncho stops, writes a note and sends the tot in to her mother. A moment later he is surrounded by the sheriff's possee and is led away to jail. Overjoyed at her baby's return, Mrs. Hart reads the note, which says Broncho is coming back to look for her some day and to kiss the "kid" for him. With a prayer in her heart, she resolves to wait for him.

THE RETURN OF WILLIAM MARR (June 20).—William Marr, a drunkard, deserts his wife because she refuses to give him money for liquor. Meeting up with a tramp, Marr gives up his clothes for a flask of whiskey. A few hours later the tramp, wearing Marr's garb, is killed by a freight train and his features so mangled that recognition is impossible. Mrs. Marr believes the body to be that of her husband, recognizing the clothes. Marr reads notice of the accident in the paper, decides to let matters rest as they are and disappears. Seven years later Mrs. Marr is happily married to a wealthy society man, and her memory of Marr is becoming but a faint thread when one night she is suddenly confronted by him in her drawing-room. Marr is bearded, reveals his identity and explains his being alive. Learning of her second marriage, he agrees to keep silent if she will supply him with money. She allows him to blackmail her for several days, then one night she has no money and he takes a necklace. Rendered desperate, she attempts to cower him with a revolver, but he tears it from her hand and is cautioning her when the gun is accidentally discharged and he falls dead in the chair. A moment later her husband rushes in with an officer, having heard the shot outside, and the secret of the past is forever sealed when she explains the dead man was a burglar and she killed him in self defense.

DERBY DAY AT CHURCHILL DOWNS (June 21).—The film shows one of the famous Kentucky stock-farms for the breeding of fine horses, and many excellent views of the mares and their colts and the yearlings out for their daily recreation have been obtained. Then we are introduced to three famous sires, Sir Alvescot, Sempronious and Sir Huon. The bedtime routine is gone through with, and the speeders bid us good night from their spacious stalls. Next we are transported to the race course and acquainted with the morning activities around the stables, the stable-boys at play and grooming a racer for the track. Billy Butters, the track mascot, is next introduced, and proves to be a highly interesting type of the genus "goat." Getting the track in shape for the great race, and the schooling of the youngsters at the barrier are shown and Derby Day is at hand. The Kentucky Derby, held recently at Louisville, was admirably filmed and scenes of the great parkway for autos, the paddock, the jockeys' headquarters and the enormous crowd are vividly depicted. Next we see the riders in the Derby on their mounts, the call to the post, the parade past the cheering grandstands, the jockeying at the barrier and at last "They're off!" Sensational scenes of the great Derby race, photographed with long-range lenses and following the thoroughbreds in their mad dash around the great course, with the rousing finish under the wire neck and neck. The wonderful three-year-old "Worth," winner of the Derby, with the triumphant jockey, in splendid views complete as thrilling and sensational racing picture as has ever been released.

THE FOREMAN'S COUSIN (June 22).—Bob Knight, foreman of the Five-Bar Ranch receives a letter one morning from his Eastern cousin, Bob Lawlor, saying he will arrive next day for his vacation. Knight loves pretty Sue Jordan, a gay little coquette, and they are engaged. Next morning Lawlor arrives and Knight introduces him to Sue. She immediately is struck with his Eastern clothes and manners and it is the same old story—a case of love at first sight between the two. A week later Knight saves Lawlor from losing his money in a cowboy crap game, but the Easterner in led on by a couple of renegades, who get him to the town saloon and break him at faro. Discouraged, Lawlor is easily persuaded to join in rustling some cattle. Later the loss of the cattle is discovered and the cowboys find a photo that has fallen from Lawlor's pocket, and inscribed to "Bob." They go to Sue and question her. She shows her treachery by saving her new love, Lawlor, and sending the boys after Knight, whom she declares she gave the photo to, and inscribed it. Returning to the ranch a few hours after, Lawlor meets Sue and tells of losing the photo. She now tells him that she has shielded him by putting the blame of the rustling on Knight, and awaits his caress, but Lawlor furiously denounces her treachery, mounts, rides to the sheriff, confesses his guilt and the sheriff arrives in time to free Knight from the clutches of the cowboys. Realizing Sue's true nature, Knight seeks her out, tears the photo into shreds, casts them at her feet and strides away, leaving her with only the remnants of two shattered romances to weep over.

CINES.

THE FRAILTY OF MAN (June 18).—When the fascination of gambling gets its death-like grip upon a man, evil consequences are almost sure to follow sooner or later. Henry Willard, a handsome young fellow, develops a liking for cards, and neglects everything else in an endeavor to gain favor with Dame Fortune. His wealthy friend, Wharton, is forced to come to his assistance time and time again, but does not succeed in persuading him to give up gambling.

Having exacted a promise of temporary reform from his friend, Wharton leaves town and, not imagining that any evil could occur during his absence, enjoys a pleasant visit with friends in a small college town. He delights especially in the company of a charming young lady, who quite captivates his heart.

When he returns to the city, he soon learns that Henry, having broken his promise and fallen deeply in debt, has been tempted to obtain money over his absent friend's signature. He immediately goes to Henry's office to demand an explanation.

What is a Concave Screen AND Why is it made Concave?

The "Perfection Concave Screen"

is composed of from 80 to 100 pieces of fireproofed wood, forming almost a perfect spider web in its construction. Every one of these pieces is so shaped that when the whole is covered with a specially prepared fireproofed wood fibre, it presents a surface concaved to exactly fit the conditions of the picture projected. That is, every one of these 80 to 100 pieces is concaved to such a nicety that when they are put together every ray of light from the lens to every portion of its surface is exactly the same length.

This eliminates all distortion in size, shape and perspective

The concavity is also made so perfect that every ray of light from the lens to every inch of its surface strikes it in such a manner that there is thus preventing all eye-strain, regardless of the position in the house the spectator may be seated.

Your front and side seats are just as desirable as any in the theatre

Every feature of shape and construction of these screens is thoroughly covered by applications for U. S. patents, which will be protected by this company.

Prices are according to size and stage conditions.

Let us know your requirements and allow us to quote you.

But in the midst of his angry denunciation, what is his surprise when in walks the young lady to whom he has become engaged, and who proves to be Henry's sister.

This complicates matters considerably. Wharton is torn between love and duty, the former soon proves the stronger, however, and he agrees to forgive and forget for the sake of the sister whom he loves.

HER VENGEANCE (June 22).—After a pleasure ride, the wife, lying weary and ill in a lonely shed, is suddenly aroused by dense smoke and crackling fire—the work of her treacherous husband. She staggers about in a fit of terror, attempting to dodge the leaping flames. Finally she manages to make her way through the burning door to safety, but her mind has become unhinged, and she rushes into the distance tearing her long black hair and shrieking in wild horror.

A few months later, after partial recovery, her mind reverts to her past experience. She broods; she ponders; she stares, as if the power of some terrible thought were fastening upon her, and then leaps forward with an air of satisfaction. Her life has now an all absorbing motive; she must find her husband.

A long search brings her to his residence just in time to see him preparing to take his fianceé out riding. At the sight of his wife's approach, he attempts safety in flight, but he reckons not with whom he deals, for quickly mounting the other horse, she desperately gives chase, and after a perilous ride succeeds in bringing him to bay at the edge of a steep precipice. After a short struggle, she hurls him over the brink, and watches the falling body with delirious glee.

LUBIN.

THE CHOIR OF DENSMORE (June 17).—Nellie Perry, with her husband and little son of three months, lived in the city and had a hard struggle suppressing poverty. They were, however, fairly happy until Perry was killed. The mother seeks employment, but cannot find a position where the child can be admitted. Mrs. Grace Parker, her aunt, hears of Nellie's sad condition and offers her a home in the country. The aunt is a member of the village church, and one day the Rev. Dr. Belden calls, and, hearing a sweet voice accompanied by the organ, inquires as to who is singing. Being introduced, he persuades Nellie to join the choir and is duly introduced and installed. Her wonderful voice, however, causes a jealousy among the other women, and especially when a delegation from a country town pays a visit and raves over the little widow's singing. The gossips of the choir get busy and, without making due inquiry, begin to question Nellie's past life. A Mrs. Harcourt is among the visitors and recognizes the sweet singer as one who called upon her sometime ago for employment, and then carried a child. The choir is up in arms and the next time Nellie reports for rehearsal, she is told she is no longer wanted and is practically driven from the church. The same night Nellie enters the church after dark and prays for strength to withstand the ordeal. The minister enters and finds her kneeling. Taking her to his home he hears her story. This he reports to the congregation, which fills the choir with remorse and they ask forgiveness, which is readily given.

THE WIDOW CASEY'S RETURN (June 19).—Mrs. Casey, a pretty young widow is sought by O'Brien and Sullivan, who are rivals. Mrs Casey shows a preference to O'Brien, who is the younger and better looking than Sullivan. Sullivan and O'Brien call on Mrs. Casey at the same time. They determine that neither would leave before the other, so both make love to Mrs. Casey while she is ironing. O'Brien unfortunately picks up a hot iron and Sullivan unconsciously places his hat on the gas stove. The hat catches fire, which compels Sullivan to rush from the house, leaving O'Brien and the widow alone. O'Brien takes advantage of his opportunity and he and the widow becomes engaged. Mrs. Casey goes to market, and, fearing O'Brien might call, she writes on a card, "Wait Inside," and tacks it on the front door. She is about to go when her black sash catches, and Mrs. Casey walks away without discovering that she has left the sash behind. A newsboy sees it and hangs it on a nail by the door. Then he looks at the card on the door and changes it from "Wait Inside" to "Wake Inside," pinning it on the sash. Immediately after his departure a dozen of Mrs. Casey's neighbors, pasing by the house, see the ominous crape, think that Mrs. Casey is dead and proceed to pass the news about the village.

Meanwhile a hobo, tortured by the pangs of hunger, has entered the kitchen of the dwelling and eats his fill. He then goes to the bed-room, and lays on the bed, pulls the sheet over his head and falls asleep. By this time Mrs. Casey's neighbors begin to enter the "chamber of death," carrying floral offerings. On seeing the still body underneath the sheet, they take it for granted that they are looking upon the remains of poor, poor Mrs. Casey. They pile the "bier" high with floral offerings and give vent to their grief. Meanwhile, as Mrs. Casey is doing her marketing, O'Brien and Sullivan are procuring marriage licenses. Sullivan, unable to read, gets a dog license, while O'Brien secures a marriage license. They then buy a bunch of flowers and proceed to the widow's. They view with alarm the black ribbon hanging on the door, and on entering the death chamber become wild with grief. The hobo continues to snooze peacefully. Mrs. Casey returns, struggling under the weight of a big basket. She enters her room, filled with mourners and creates a panic. Her profound amazement is not half so great as the terror of the neighbors, who think they are looking at Mrs. Casey's ghost. In the height of the confusion, the hobo springs wildly from the bed and dashes through the front door. The crowd follow and after an exciting chase, capture him and return to the house. Explanations follow, and when the neighbors have recovered their composure, someone suggests that a wedding be performed on the spot. The flowers, the minister, the guests, the bride and groom are there; so instead of sad funeral bells, there are gay wedding chimes.

THE INGRATE (June 20).—Mr. Morris, a banker, is visited one day by a stranger who introduces himself as the son of an old friend who has died, and presents a letter from his father asking that Morris look after his son. The banker is deeply touched and readily accepts the charge, introducing the boy to his daughter and accepting him as one of the family. The boy, Ralph Marsdon, quickly becomes a spendthrift. He is dissipated, and Mr. Morris, who has learned to care for him almost as his own son, is greatly grieved. Ralph becomes heavily involved and Mr. Morris, weary of the many demands made upon him, refuses to give him more money. Pressed to the wall by his importunate creditors, Ralph forges his adopted father's name to a cheque, which he gets cashed. The cashier is suspicious and calls at the home of the banker. In order to prevent a scandal, the banker tells the cashier that the cheque is his. After the cashier has left, however, he denounces Ralph as an ingrate and tells him that on the morrow he must leave his house. At his wit's end, Ralph decides to poison his benefactor. He watches his chance and while the old gentleman is sleeping in his library chair that night, steals the forged cheque, as well as a large sum of money from the banker's desk and pours some cyanide of potassium in a bottle of medicine standing by his chair. Shortly after the nurse enters and gives Mr. Morris a dose of the fatal mixture. His agony arouses the household and in order to avoid suspicion, Ralph comes into the room with the rest of them. Mr. Morris tries to tell of Ralph's action, but death stills his speech forever. The attending physician detects the cyanide in the bottle and causes the arrest of the nurse. Feeling that he was now free from any possibility of suspicion, Ralph takes the money he has stolen and enters into a wild life of dissipation. He finds no pleasure, however, in his career for he is constantly haunted by visions of the friend whom he had done to death. Finally, he is driven into a mental state which he can no longer endure. The visions haunt him till he goes to the authorities, confesses his crime, the innoecnt nurse is released and the guilty man takes her place.

THE RUNAWAYS (June 22).—Harry and May Nugent returned from their honeymoon and settled in a nice little home in Brooklyn. They were a devoted couple, but May's experience at housekeeping was a little shy and it caused the first quarrel. Angry and bitter one day, Harry writes a letter to his pretty wife, telling her he is going away disgusted. He packs his suit case and catches the 10.30 train for Seaville. May, whose feelings are also hurt, has made a similar plan. Not noticing her husband's letter, which he hid under a blotter, she writes him an almost identical one and leaves for Seaville on the 11.30. There she engages a room at the same hotel and is located next door to Harry. Neither is very happy; the cooking is nothing wonderful and May is annoyed by the eyeing of the gilded youths. Both regret the situation and retire early, only to lie awake, each thinking of the other. During the night a bad man attempts to rob the guests. May hearing strange noises, creeps from her room for help. Harry does exactly the same, and in the semi-darkness they rush into each other's arms. May thinks she has bumped into the burglar. The guests are aroused by her shrieks, and attachés rush to the scene. The lights are turned up and consternation prevails as they see a man and woman in demi-toilet rush into each other's arms. When the excitement is over, Harry draws his wife into his room and the next morning more surprise is in order when the maid finds the lady's room empty and sees a pair of gentlemen's shoes and a pair of ladies' pumps outside of the room next door.

THE PRICE OF ART (June 10).—Jessie Ficke, an artist, determines to enter a $5,000 prize contest, for the best marine study exhibited before the National Art Club. In an island village she finds the type of model she requires, in Tom King, a brawny young fisherman. Tom consents to pose for her, and in order to keep him in good humor, she allows him to believe that she is somewhat attached to him. He accompanies her to her city studio, where the picture is to be completed. His infatuation for the artist breaks the heart of his "girl," who is blind. Finally, the picture is finished. Jessie, the artist, now repulses her model in his attempts at love making, and with a sneer offers him money for his services. He madly refuses this sort of compensation and, realizing that the artist cares nothing for him, now that the picture is finished, Tom slashes it to ribbons and hastens back to beg forgiveness of the little girl he has slighted.

THE OLD STAGE COACH (June 11).—Frank Richards, driver for the Continental Stage Line in the early '70s, gets a new coach to drive. June Adams is a passenger and becomes Frank's sweetheart. June, in bad health, goes away to save her life, but in vain. Her death endears the coach to Frank, as it is a part of his life romance. The railroad renders the stage line useless, and the coaches are sold at auction. Frank tries to buy the coach he drove, but is outbid by a stranger. Broken hearted, Richards leaves and, years later, dressed in his old garb, is known as Dad Richards, and loved by all. One day he meets his old superintendent, now a railroad president, at a "Wild West" show. They see a mock hold-up of an old stage coach and Frank recognizes it as the one he drove. The president received a telegram stating that his wife is dying, and a wreck on the road causes him to get the old coach to reach her side. Frank again drives the coach. He races with a train and, upon reaching the station, it is found he has driven his last trip. Frank has gone to his last reward with a peaceful smile on his face.

THE VISION BEAUTIFUL (June 13).—Longfellow's beautiful poem, "The Legend Beautiful," suggested the story told by "The Vision Beautiful." The strugle between inclination and desire is fought out in the breast of a young monk, who is an artist and dreamer, having little sympathy for the menial tasks his vows entail. He is brought into close relations with the poorest and most miserable of the peasant class, and lothes the task of ministering to their wants. He experiences many hours of self-condemnation in his lonely cell, but sees the true light of his sacred calling, when a vision of "The Master" appears to him and shows that whatever kindly deed he does for the least and lowliest of his people is done for Him. The path of duty is clearly pointed out and the young monk cheerfully goes about his Master's work.

GOODY-GOODY JONES (June 14).—Mr. Jones, unlike many husbands, is entirely too domestic to suit his wife. She dislikes his excessive love making and decides to get some pills that, taken in his office, will make the outside world more attractive. The anti-kissing wife succeeds in getting the pills and, from an ardent lover of his wife and home, Jones becomes a wife hater, and smashes the "God Bless Our Home" motto. He raves at her and goes out to become impressed with every woman he sees, kissing the maid before he does so. On his way about town nursemaids, society ladies and, in fact, the whole female population look good to Jones. He puts them in a panic and pursues them over walls, into manholes, up the sides of houses, all the while followed by a bunch of would-be important policemen. Mrs Jones learns the value of her husband's love, and resolves to cut out the pill dope in the future.

THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS NO. 7—They corrupt the school (June 14).—Another great big laughing farce, with the world-famous Katzenjammer Kids furnishing the film.

THE PROFESSOR'S WOOING (June 17).—John Farley pursues his particular hobby, biology, on the beautiful island of Catalina. He encounters the handsome Tessa and, though middle-aged, becomes a victim of her unconscious charms. She is loved by one of her own kind, Fernand, a sturdy young fisherman. She likes Fernand, but learns to love Farley. Fernand therefore relinquishes his claims. Farley, offered a professorship, leaves to accept it, promising to write and come back as soon as he can. He plunges into his new duties and neglects to write his island sweetheart, who pines away at his silence and absence. Farley, however, has not forgotten her and, when able to do so, he again visits the island and takes her into the safe-keeping of his arms.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE NANCY LEE (June 18).—Captain William Johnson buys the "Nancy Lee," and, as new owner of it, is given a letter to its head officer, Captain Brown, but loses same on his way to the boat. "Weary Willie" Johnson, a tramp, is thrown out of a saloon at about the same time Captain Johnson loses his letter. Officer Burns finds the letter and by mistake restores it to the wrong Johnson. Captain Johnson, having lost the letter, decides to ship as a common sailor on his own boat. He changes his clothes, writes an explanatory note to his wife and daughter and leaves for the boat where he secures employment. In the meantime the tramp has read the other Johnson's letter and has stowed away in a large bread basket on board. Captain Johnson's wife and daughter have read the note and decide to go aboard the captain's new boat. The tramp is found in the bread basket by the Chinese cook, and is turned over to Captain Brown. Brown, upon finding the letter of authority which states Johnson is the new owner, immediately starts in to wine and dine poor, bewildered Weary. Finally everything is righted and Captain Johnson, the real owner, is identified and given charge.

IN EXILE (June 20).—Count Romanoff is a Russian nobleman who learns that the police will raid a secret political meeting of his nihilist friends. He warns them and escapes as the police appear. With his wife and infant daughter he gets to California, where he hires out to Harrington, an orange grower as a fruit picker. Olga Romanoff grows up into a beautiful girl, and at the death of her father takes his place in the packing house. Herbert, the son of Harrington, is put in charge of the place on his return from college, and his father plans to have him marry Margaret, the beautiful daughter of an old chum, now a rich banker, and she is invited to visit the Harringtons. Herbert meets and falls in love with Olga. The foreman, also in love with her, complains to the millionaire. Herbert confesses his love for the orange packer to his father, who threatens to disinherit him if he does not leave her and court Margaret now a guest. But Herbert refuses. A reception is held in honor of Margaret. To disgust Herbert with Olga, Harrington commands her attendance. Olga, bewildered, appears in her plain attire and is suddenly presented to the social gathering by the old schemer as Herbert's intended. Olga is much distressed, but Herbert defends her and leaves with her. As they start through the grove Olga's mother comes hurriedly in search of her. A wealthy French relative has left a fortune to Olga. Herbert escorts Olga and her mother back to the house where he proudly introduces them as the Countess Romanoff and her daughter, and the Harringtons and guests hasten to welcome them.

SHEEP SHEARING IN NEW MEXICO (June 21).—Wool growing in New Mexico has grown to be one of the great industries of the southwest. Very few people are familiar with the practical side of sheep raising and shearing. The picture abounds with interesting scenes on and about a great sheep ranch. We see large herds of sheep being brought in from the mountains and ranges, watering of the herd, counting the sheep, catching the bucks, preparing for the shearing, the shearing itself, sacking the wool for market, and the sheep as they appear after their wool has been removed. Little scenes of human interest on the ranch give the film an added value.

THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS, NO. 8—THE ARRIVAL OF COUSIN OTTO (June 21).—Original, mischief-making schemes are born in the minds of the Katzenjammer Kids with lightning-like rapidity, and they are no sooner born, than perpetrated upon poor, unsuspecting Cousin Otto.

EDISON.

A MAN IN THE MAKING (June 18).—Dick, a working boy in a shop, accepts an offer of a place in a gambling establishment in the hope of getting out of the rut. When the house is raided, he drops out of a side window to escape the officers and finds himself in the yard of a residence and face to face with a beautiful girl who receives his explanations with sweet dignity and leaves him to make his escape as he chooses. Somehow he never can forget her and life seems different to him after this experience. He declines a further offer from his gambling friend and accepts the first opportunity to better himself. This comes in an invitation to join the Y. M. C. A. classes for mechanical drawing and here he begins to feel that he is on the right road towards worthiness of his ideal—the girl of his dreams. Things go well until, passing her house one day, he sees her come out accompanied by another young man. He then realizes his own unfitness in comparison with the gilded youth; but having started on the right road he perseveres.

His knowledge gained in technical drawing helps him to devise an automobile gear and he is promoted to an office position with the firm of manufacturers by whom he is employed. In the Y. M. C. A. gynasium he meets the young man which he had seen with his ideal and whom he supposes to be her fiance. And then one day this young man comes to the automobile factory to ask for him on some matter of repairs and when he accompanies him to the machine standing at the door he is introduced to the man's sister, who proves to be the girl of his dreams. The picture closes with a more than probable love story on the horizon.

TARGET PRACTICE OF ATLANTIC FLEET, U. S. NAVY (June 19).—A great fleet of battleships, grim and gray, silently sailing along at the rate of fifteen knots an hour. Suddenly these great engines of war become alive; the big guns that look so cold belch forth a terrific fire that sends enormous shells weighing about a thousand pounds, singing on their way. Their course is directed toward a dot-like object far on the horizon not visible to the naked eye. This dot is a small target six miles away, being towed by a steamer at the rate of six knots per hour.

Cameras placed on the towing steamer and on the fleet show every detail of practice in superb photography from the firing of the guns to the striking of the shells. The huge missiles hit the water within a few feet of the target, or, after piercing the target itself, and bury their fury in the deep, sending gyser-like sprays high in the air. Another spectacular scene, obtained only after camera and operator were lashed to the turret of the twelve-inch guns, shows a close view of them in action.

Pictures taken aboard the bullet-riddled derelict the U. S. S. San Marcos, formerly the U. S. S. Texas, of Spanish-American War fame, used now for preliminary practice, show the result of well trained men behind the guns. There are many other scenes, all of intense interest, showing the manoeuvering of the fleet and action aboard ship as if it were an actual naval engagement.

APPLE PIES (June 19).—The church fair in the village is always a big event. All of the good housewives and also the embryo housewives have a spell of baking cakes and pies. In Josh Jordan's family the women folk were elected to bake the apple pies for the coming event; the big church fair. We see the interior of a well-to-do farmhouse kitchen; pretty girls and matrons are busy peeling, paring and baking apple pies.

While the ladies have been busily engaged as above, they receive a call from an itinerant merchant selling wares from a wagon. Among his diversified stock is an article that he calls "Sleep Sugar," a harmless potion, which if put in food where thievery is suspected, will catch the culprit. The ladies try to get rid of him but his persistency is too strong for them. While they are thus engaged one of the pies on the shelf disappears. The alarm is given by one of the girls and the agent, taking advantage of the opportunity, makes a sale.

The pies are doctored and soon the good women have four disreputable soiled members of society, better known as tramps, secure in the meshes of a clothes line. The constable arrives with his deputy, the restoring battery is put to work and the wriggling, writhing mass of "gentlemen of the road" is in the clutch of the two limbs of the law. The ladies and children bid the tramps a parting farewell with many laughs and jeers.

THE PASSER-BY (June 21).—A young man, giving a farewell bachelor dinner, receives a note at the last moment saying that one of his guests is obliged to leave town and cannot attend. Rather than allow his place to remain empty he sends two of his friends to the street to bring in the first man who passes. They enter into the spirit of the idea descend to the street and pounce upon a poorly dressed old man and, in spite of his protests, drag him in to the dinner. At the finish of the dinner he is called upon for a story and in answer to their insistent demands proceeds to tell them the story of his life.

Years ago he too was giving a farewell bachelor dinner, surrounded by his friends, happy in the love of a woman who was to be his wife the next day. He was the life and gaiety of the party. In the midst of merriment he was handed a note from the woman saying that she had married another man an hour before. Completely crushed, his first thoughts were of suicide but his manhood revolting at this, he decided to fight down his love and forget her if possible. He plunged into speculation and with several friends formed a pool to corner a certain stock. While the fight for control was raging furiously and when the victory was within his grasp, he suddenly caught sight of the woman in the balcony of the Stock Exchange. Her husband was his opponent. Her mute appeal so unnerved him that the tide set in against him and he went down to utter ruin.

Time passed and he was now only the confidential clerk of one of his former associates. In this position a momentary abstraction was brought about by a newspaper item in reference to the woman which caused him to commit a serious blunder, resulting in his discharge.

Years later we see him a prematurely aged man, employed as bookkeeper. His employer, receiving an urgent call from a friend for funds, entrusts him with a number of securities to be delivered at once. Hurrying along Wall Street he meets the woman alighting from her car. Forgetting his errand he stares vacantly after her and finally returns to the office without delivering the securities. His seeming carelessness is rewarded by immediate discharge. Thereafter his decline on the social ladder is very rapid until he has become merely a hanger-on in the great world of frenzied finance, an object of jest to strangers and of pity and charity to his former friends. And that is the story of the passer-by invited to the feast. His story has a chastening effect upon the merry crowd. The host hands him his card, saying that if he will call he will help him. The passer-by bids them goodnight, but as he turns to go he comes face to face with the portrait of a beautiful woman which is hanging over the mantel. Clutching a chair he hoarsely asks his host who she is and is told that she is his mother. Glancing at the card his young host has given him he reads the name for the first time. It is that of the woman's son. He cannot accept any favors from such a source. He slowly tears up the card, pulls himself together and goes out to become again merely—a passer-by.

THE GIRL AT THE KEY (June 22).—That Helen or Mabel or Ruth, or whatever her father chooses to call her, was a girl after his own type, is plainly shown shortly after this reel begins. Like her father she sees what she desires and she is determined to have it and in this particular instance it proves to be a man and one who is worthy of her choice. But her father thinks no, while the daughter thinks yes, under her breath at first, but ere the story is finished we are made aware of the fact that that yes meant thousands of dollars to her father, who obtains a splendid financier for a son-in-law. How this is all brought about would be far better to see than to tell, but one might be given the key to the situation when one is told that the lover is inveigled upon father's private yacht. Then something happens to the engine accidentally on purpose and they are at a standstill far from the site of New York town and Wall Street and when the stock market opens next morning the lover fails to be at hand to save himself from financial ruin and no one to send a wireless message to the office. But if love laughs at locksmiths why not at wireless operators as well, for the young lady in question proves to be the little girl at the key; father is caught in his own trap and when the settlement is made it is the young lady's hand that binds the bargain.

VITAGRAPH.

THE NIPPER'S LULLABY (June 17).—Bill Hammond, a young coster, is anxiously expecting the first addition to his family. The nurse announces the birth of a boy; Bill is wild with joy. He is taken upstairs to see his son and is awe-stricken and half afraid to handle it. Later, he is seen acting as nurse and singing the baby to sleep with the "Nipper's Lullaby."

Times are hard. Bill gets out of work and gets in with bad companions. He starts to drown his sorrows in drink and often leaves his wife and child at home, supperless. One night, after visiting a "pub," intoxicated, Bill wanders down to the water front, and tumbles from a pier. He is picked up by a tramp steamer unconscious. By the time he recovers from his debauch and drowning experience, he finds himself well out to sea, bound for a foreign port.

He realizes his follies and sins. In the meantime, things have gone badly with his wife. She tries to support her child as a scrub woman. In her trouble, Dr. Brown comes to her and tells her of a society woman who wishes to adopt her boy. For the child's sake she yields, but pleads to have him with her for one last night. As she sits by the fire, singing the words of the "Nipper's Lullaby," Bill returns, takes up the song she is singing and clasps his wife and child in his arms. Bill has learned a lasting lesson and all is forgiven.

HER DIARY (June 18).—In reduced circumstances, Mrs. Swanson, a widowed lady of gentle birth, is obliged to sell her home, which is purchased by her avaricious brother, John. She uses the money to keep her only son, Warren, in college. He graduates with high honors, and has scarcely started on a business career, when he is accused of defalcation. She spends her savings in his defense, but in vain. Her son in prison, and her money gone, aged and too proud to ask for assistance, she goes to the poor house.

After three years, she receives word that her brother John has died, and willed her the property which he so heartlessly took from her. In fact, he makes her the sole heir of all his wealth. She returns to the old homestead. Sitting in her loneliness, she takes her constant companion, her diary of the eventful happenings of her life, from her hand-bag, and reads the records of the past. They appear vividly before her, from her wedding day to the time of her boy's arrest, then the sacrifice of her home, the eviction by her brother, her son's imprisonment and her journey to the poor house. These entries touch her deeply, and while weeping her boy returns to her from jail, saying: "The guilty man, on his death bed, confessed the crime for which I suffered, but to-day I am innocent, free, and again with you to sustain and comfort you for all you have done and passed through for me."

CHASED BY BLOODHOUNDS (June 19).—Mr. Bunny is a breeder of fine poultry. A poor negro calls at his home and asks him for some old clothing. Mr. Bunny looks his visitor over and provides him with a complete outfit. After his generosity and charity, our fat friend contentedly reads over the awards by the "Chicken Breeders' Association" of several prizes for his exhibits at the State Fair.

The colored man notices the fat and sleek fowl in the enclosure about the grounds. Waiting his chance, he helps himself to one of the birds, finding an ample hiding place in the recess of Bunny's suit. In the morning Bunny discovers the loss of his chickens and calls upon a friend who owns a sharp-scented bloodhound, which he employs to go in pursuit of the thief. The dog scents the foot-tracks of the negro, who wears a pair of Bunny's shoes. The hound immediately starts after Bunny, who is obliged to flee for his life through the highways and byways, while the negro and his family enjoy a chicken dinner at Bunny's expense.

Hot and exhausted, Bunny succeeds in getting back to his own home. Hastily undressing, he goes to bed to forget his terrible experiences. It is useless; he dreams that he is being chased by bloodhounds. Haunted by this terrible nightmare, he awakes, gazes about, and dodges under the covers of the bed to shut the horrible apparition from his expectant eyes.

HER BROTHER (June 21).—Mr. Clarke, a thorough business man, quarrels with his son Tom, because of his indifference to commercial affairs. Tom resolves to go ranching in the West. He gets into bad company and is at a pretty low ebb. George Fowler, a ranch owner, who has taken a fancy to him, tells him to brace up and he will give him a position. In the meantime, Kate, Tom's sister, is engaged to Jim Seaton. Jim's health is not very good and he is ordered to go West for a trip. Kate, though sorry to part from him, hopes that he may get trace of Tom, from whom she has not heard for over a year, losing track of him completely.

Tom, in spite of his promises, goes back to his old habits, and Fowler is forced to discharge him. Jim Seaton is an old friend of Fowler's, and is going to visit his ranch. Jim meets Tom without knowing him, and Fowler tells him something of Tom's story, without mentioning names. At the hotel bar, Tom, who is loafing around, sees the large wad of bills Jim displays in paying a bill.

A few days later, while riding around the ranch, Jim is taken with a fainting spell and stops to rest, while Fowler rides on to attend to some business. Jim, while half-dazed, is attacked by Tom and robbed. On Fowler's return the sheriff is told of the robbery, and his men are put on the track of Tom. When captured and brought face to face with Jim, he learns Tom's name for the first time, and for Kate's sake, Jim denies that Tom is the man who robbed him. He tells Tom who he is and makes him swear to reform. Tom does so and this time keeps his oath. Two years later, when Kate and Jim are happily married, Tom returns to them, a changed and prosperous man.

THE GAMBLERS (June 22).—Mrs. Travers, a society leader, is madly in love with Arthur Ingraham, a rising diplomat. Arthur is not in love with her and avoids her advances. He is in love with Beatrice Langton, a young debutante, to whom he becomes engaged. Mrs. Travers is furious. She looks for some means to avenge herself on the innocent Beatrice. Professing great friendship, she gets her to come to her house to play bridge, contrives that she shall lose, and at the end of the game, Beatrice, whose means are very modest, finds herself in debt. Assuming friendship, Mrs. Travers promises to pay the debt, and accepts an I. O. U. from Beatrice, saying she can take her time to pay her. Beatrice is delighted, but later finds she is unable to meet her obligations to Mrs. Travers. She begs her to be lenient and considerate. The avenging woman then shows her claws and refuses to help her or delay payment unless she will break her engagement with Ingraham.

In desperation, Beatrice, fearing her lover's displeasure and disrespect, consents, and returns to him her engagement ring. At first Ingraham is angry. Then he begins to suspect some underhand work. He overhears Mrs. Travers speaking to Beatrice over the telephone, and induces Beatrice to confess the truth to him. He turns the tables on Mrs. Travers, paying her what Beatrice owes her, and telling her what he thinks of her conduct. Realizing that she has not only lost his love, but his friendship, and made herself hateful to him, she departs, leaving Beatrice and Arthur more firmly locked in love's embrace.

BIOGRAPH.

LENA AND THE GEESE (June 17).—For reasons of state, the first-born, a baby girl, is sent away and placed in the care of Gretchen, a trusted peasant woman, who is the widowed mother of a little child about the same age. The two children grow up as sisters. Later, upon her deathbed, the noble lady repents and sends for her child to reinstate her. Gretchen takes this opportunity to make a great lady of her own daughter Lena, the goose girl, by sending her to court instead of the real heiress. Hence Lena is taken before the noble lady as she breathes her last, happy in the belief that she has made reparation. Lena is now a great lady, but the title is a great misfit—court etiquette with her is hard work. She longs to be back with Gretchen and her "geeses." She endures it as long as she can and then bolts. Gretchen, by this time, is sorry for her deception, and is only too eager to straighten the affair.

THE SPIRIT AWAKENED (June 20).—The girl, her father and invalid mother toil to keep their small farm, which is mortgaged. The mortgage falls due, and gathering together their earnings, they find the sum not quite enough. On the farm are two farmhands—one a true Christian, who is the butt of the other, a renegade. The renegade imposes upon the Christian boy, regarding him to be without spirit. The boy learns of the family's need, and gives his mite, which increases their store sufficiently to pay off the mortgage. The renegade learns of the mortgage money, and, having victimized one of the young women of the village, decides to get his money and get away. It is now that the Christian boy shows his spirit and after an exciting chase and fight, succeeds in recovering the money.

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 24, 1912 (June 10).—Constantinople, Turkey. The sultan, attended by his personal guard, makes one of his infrequent trips from his palace to open the parliament.

St. Cloud, France. Twenty balloons start in the Distance Race, organized by the Aero Club of France.

Plainfield, N. J. On the last lap of the campaign, Theodore Roosevelt makes this town sit up and take notice with a vivid political speech.

Paris, France. The new fashions in hair dressing and summer millinery are voted as excellent by the society women of the French capital.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Twenty-five thousand people attend the Annual Field Mass in front of the barracks in the Navy Yard.

Frohnau, Germany. The first trials for the Olympic games bring out many likely candidates for the honor of representing Germany at the Copenhagen Stadium.

Portland, Ore. The summer resort near this city, known as Sea Side, is completely destroyed by fire.

Rehoboth, Del. New and alleged authentic information as to the hiding place of Captain Kidd's buried treasure leads a group of men into the Indian River Inlet country on a search. They are using scientific methods and blasting out all the stumps in their efforts.

New York, N. Y. Ten thousand soldiers, national guardsmen and veterans, march through the city in honor of those who fought in the War of the Rebellion.

New York, N. Y. The U. S. Grant Post of the G. A. R. hold ceremonies at the tomb of their former general.

Anderson, Indiana. The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks hold their annual state reunion in this city.

THE GAMBLER'S REFORMATION (June 19).—A gambler just married is caught cheating at the gaming table and travels over the state line. His wife, deserted, tries to go back home, but her strength failing, she stops at a wayside inn, where she obtains employment. One night she hears someone trying to rob the inn and shoots the intruder. The innkeeper, rushing upon the scene, finds the wounded man, and, in the feeble rays of the lantern which he carries, the girl discovers that she has shot her husband. He recovers, however, and they live happily forever afterward.

THE FICKLE SOLDIER (June 20).—A soldier has to leave his fiancee and go on special duty elsewhere. Here he meets a charming little girl, with whom he falls in love, and in a rash moment proposes and is accepted. About this time he is ordered back to his home post only to find that his betrothed has eloped. He returns to his little sweetheart in the West, but her father has read in the meantime of his engagement to the girl at home and consequently he meets with a warm reception and the engagement is broken off. That day on attempting to rescue a little girl from a perilous position in the river, the Lieutenant loses his life.

AN INDIAN IDYL (June 22).—A beautiful picture of Indian life, which, though not stirring in its theme, contains many interesting scenes and some fast riding. The story is woven about a love affair that springs up between the daughter of the Sioux Chief and a brave from the Crow tribe.

C. G. P. C.

MIMI'S LOVE STORY (June 18).—This is the story told in the opera of "La Boheme" and needs little or no explanation, as everyone is no doubt familiar with the story of the little woman who escapes from the toil of the millinery shop to live with those who love her in the Bohemian-Latin quarter of Paris. And how she, dazzled by the promises of a wealthy man, ran away from these good friends only to return later broken in spirit and in health to lie in the shabby little room in which her real happiness was found.

THE MYSTIFIED PIERROT (June 21).—This excellent pantomime is highly entertaining and there is considerable novelty to those who have not heretofore had the pleasure of witnessing a pantomimic performance. It tells the story of a beautiful Columbine, a wily Harlequin and a simple Pierrot, whose love affairs are so intricately interwoven as to make a very interesting little sketch.

LONDON (June 21).—A comprehensive, entertaining, interesting and instructive film of the largest city in the world; its public buildings, picturesque streets, grotesque gargoyles, and its historic piles, etc.

THE BELLE OF BAR Z RANCH (June 10).—Jessie, the Belle of the Bar Z Ranch, and Jack Howard are lovers. On the day of the cowboys' "hoedown," Jack presents Jess with a beautiful engagement ring and Jessie promises to marry him after the roundup. They go to the dance and while there, Jack dances with one of Jessie's girl friends and during the dance the girl is taken ill. Jack leads her off to a side room and brings her a glass of water. In the meantime, Jessie is proudly displaying her engagement ring to her girl friends. She turns to call Jack and, finding he is absent from the dance hall, goes off to look for him and finds him with his arms around the other girl. Their backs being turned toward Jess, she does not see that Jack is trying to revive the girl with a drink of water. Jess comes to the conclusion that Jack is false to her. The next day she sends back his ring with a note, telling him she will not marry him and that she wishes him to come and get his letters and presents, which he had given her during their courtship. Jack goes to Jessie's home and finds her very unreasonable. She will not answer his questions and taking his love tokens he sadly returns to the bunk-house. The cowboys scent Jack's trouble and manage to make things pretty lively for him.

As time goes on and Jack and Jess do not make up, the other boys make up their minds to take their chances on winning Jessie for a wife. They put the proposition up to Jess and in order to quiet them, she tells them to meet her at the cross roads on a certain day and lift her from the saddle in a fair race. Jack hears of this and on the day of the race he watches the boys primping and polishing up. He makes up his mind to play a trick on them and be the only man at the cross-roads to meet Jess. He finds their horses tied up outside of the bunk-house and unties them and drives them off the ranch. He then goes to meet Jess.

Jess is suspicious when the rest of the boys do not show up, so she postpones the race for a few hours. At the appointed time, the race takes place and Jack is the lucky man. The rest of the cowboys escort them to the Justice of the Peace and they are married. Jessie is pleased at the way things turn out, but she will not gratify Jack by showing it. When he comes for his husband's kiss, Jess is cold and distant. Jack begins to realize that maybe he has made a big mistake. He tells Jess that the Justice of the Peace is still there and if she wishes it, they can have the knot untied at once. As Jack turns to get the Justice of the Peace, Jess tells him she was only teasing him and that he is the only man in the world for her.

In the meantime, the rest of the girls, learning of the race, take advantage of the leap-year chance and race with the boys, with the result that the Justice of the Peace is kept busy for a few hours longer.

THE SQUATTER'S CHILD (June 12).—Dan Brierly has built a shack on disputed land. He has two daughters, Nellie, a young lady of nineteen and Edna, a child of five. John Colby, a big land owner, claims the land upon which Dan has built and, accordingly, with his son, Ned, calls upon Dan and advises him to vacate. Dan refuses and John Colby hurries away to call upon the law for aid. On their way to and from the shack, the two men meet both the squatter's daughters and Ned is exceedingly pleased with Nellie. The next day, Ned, with the officers of the law, call at Dan's shack, and as soon as Ned realizes that Nellie is the squatter's daughter, he sends them back, declaring he will attend to the matter and report to his father. Ned then proceeds to make friends with the girls and their father, but not with their hired man, the "harmless" half-wit, Pete, who is jealous of Ned's attentions to Nellie. Ned then rides away to plead with his father to allow the settler more time. The friendship of the two young people ripens into love, while the jealousy of Pete increases, especially after Nellie has refused his flowers. Ned and Nellie's trysting place is upon a small bridge. Here Pete makes one last appeal to Nellie and is not only coldly received, but upon forcing his attentions upon her, Pete is knocked down by Ned. Knowing that preparations for blasting are going on near-by, Pete goes to the place, and hiding behind a rock until the foreman's back is turned, steals half a box of dynamite and places it under the bridge. Waiting under the bridge until the time when the young people meet, he lights the fuse, but Ned and Nellie leave the bridge a few minutes before the end of the fuse is reached. In the meantime, little Edna has observed the little light under the bridge and extracts the fuse. Pete, unable to bear the strain of watching the child any longer, has rushed to the child's father and confessed. When the men reach the bridge, little Edna innocently hands the box of dynamite up to her father. The half-wit is locked up for safe keeping and John Colby is so overcome by having his boy's life saved by little Edna, that he swears eternal friendship with Dan and relinquishes his claim to the squatter's land, while the young people are happily unconscious of anything save themselves.

THE GIRL AND THE SHERIFF (June 14).—Bob Warren, sheriff of Grass County, Cal., and Jim Stearns, a young man with a weakness for gambling, are both suitors for the hand of Mary Evans, an orphan. Mary refuses Bob's offer of marriage and promises herself to Jim. Jim is sent to town to sell some cattle and after getting the money for the cattle, he stops in a saloon for a little game of cards before going back to his boss's ranch.

At the door of the saloon he is met by Bob, the sheriff, who, knowing Jim's fondness for gambling, tries to keep him in the straight and narrow way on account of Mary. He tries to pursuade Jim from entering the place but Jim tells him that he just wants to play one game and Bob's pleadings are in vain. Jim enters the saloon, where he plays Big Pete, a well-known gambler, and loses all his money. On leaving the saloon, he remembers the money he has in his possession which he received for the cattle and decides to take one last chance in an effort to win his money back. He is cleaned out again and staggers out of the saloon. Standing outside of the saloon, brooding over his misfortunes, he overhears two men talking of a large shipment of money coming in on the stage coach, and, in desperation, decides to hold it up. Going to a lonely spot on the road, he terrifies the stage-driver into giving up the box and hastens away. When the stage-coach arrives in town, the news is spread quickly and Bob, the sheriff, and his men immediately start in pursuit.

Jim, in the meantime, has blown the box open and is going through the woods on foot. When Bob and his men reach the place where the hold-up occurred, the men separate and Bob goes on alone. Following Jim's footsteps, he comes across Jim and is stunned by the realization of the fact that Jim is the culprit. A moment's hesitation gives the latter the opportunity to make good his escape. The posse, however, seeing the fleeing man, give chase, but Jim arrives safely at Mary's home. The posse arrive at Mary's home to inquire if she has seen the bandit, and Bob enters the house to observe Jim, terror-stricken, hiding in the room. The unselfish love which he bears Mary tempts him to forget his duty and he promises to help them escape that night. On leaving the house, he tells his men that the culprit did not pass that way. That night, he brings the horses to the couple and starts them out in their search for happiness in a new land.

IMP.

FANCHON, THE CRICKET (June 17),—Fanchon is a fascinating little girl, the grandchild of Mother Fadet, who is suspected of witchery by the people among whom she lives. At the opening of the story Mother Fadet is being attacked by a crowd led by Father Barbaud, the father of Landry and Didier, his twin sons; the former, a handsome and bright lad, the latter a little weak and foolish.

The old woman is about to be beaten when Fanchon arrives, and she also is beset by the men and both are in danger, until Landry appears on the scene and upbraids the mob. He is attracted by the beauty of the little madcap, who thanks him as he leaves her.

The foolish Didier is in love with Madelon, the belle of the village, who scorns him, and who is in love with the handsome brother. Didier is heartbroken and tells them he is going to commit suicide. He rushes away but is prevented from carrying out his intention by Fanchon, who follows him until he, tired, falls asleep in a clump of bushes. Landry seeks everywhere for his brother, even asking aid of the witch. She refuses to assist him, but meeting Fanchon, he askes for her help. This she promises if he will agree to dance whatever dance she may select at the fete to be held the next day. He, anxious to find his brother, consents, and she leads him to the spot where Didier sleeps.

The next day while the festivities are in progress, Fanchon, dressed in the old-fashioned clothes of her grandmother, appears and demands her dance with Landry. This he is dancing with Madelon, but being a man of his word, he asks her to excuse him and then takes Fanchon as his partner.

Madelon, angered at the manner in which Landry has treated her, tells the others that Fanchon has bewitched him by the aid of a witch's claw she always wears round her neck in a bag. She incites the mob, and they attack Fanchon, demanding to see the contents of the bag. This she hands to Landry, who reads on the paper "The Prayer of the Pure Maiden to the Holy Mother of Grace." Abashed, the mob leave the unhappy girl, who rushes home and tears off the clothes which she feels are the cause of her misery.

To get away from Landry, whom she now loves, she accepts an offer to go to the city, although he begs her to remain and marry him. Later the grandmother dies and appoints Landry's father as her guardian. She returns to her home and going to Father Barbaud asks him if he will accept the charge. At first he refuses, but realizing that the happiness of his son depends upon his marriage to the now demure Fanchon, he consents, and the formerly despised madcap has the pleasure of being begged by the old gentleman to marry his son Needless to say she does.

THE SCHEMERS (June 20).—Arthur Dennison, the only son of a wealthy man, selects the stage as his profession. His father strongly objects to the choice, and arguments proving unavailing, finally threatens to disinherit him should be persist in his determination to enter the dramatic field. Lucy, Mr. Dennison's adopted daughter, pleads for her brother, but the father remains firm, and Arthur leaves home.

While he is absent, Mr. Dennison comes under the influence of a clever adventuress with whom he falls in love and unable to resist her fascinating wiles, settles his fortune upon her. Through this woman's scheming, Lucy is driven from home, and she writes Arthur to return and save his father from ruin, for he is induced to make bad investments by the woman and her brother.

Arthur hastens home and finally succeeds in opening his father's eyes to the true character of the schemers. Mr. Dennison, realizing what a terrible mistake he has made, forgives the boy and willingly consents to his marriage with Lucy. Thus Arthur wins a bride and a prospective fortune.

CLOWNLAND (June 22).—Boyland—Girlland—Clownland—who of us has not had our dreams of all three. This film will rejuvenate the elders and rejoice the youngsters. It depicts in simple sequence the heartaches and joys of a poor, little newsboy, who seeing a circus parade is filled with longing to witness the wonderful deeds performed within the tent.

The small "newsy" finds himself on the great day without sufficient money to purchase a ticket, owing to a slump in trade. He sobs himself to sleep on the steps of his humble home—and the dream-fairies escort him to clownland. While he sleeps he is conveyed to the stage of the circus and placed in the chair of the "King," where, dressed in the royal robes, he commands the clown to dance and perform their special tricks for him. These to the delighted child are marvelous indeed. Finally, with a puff of smoke the "King" vanishes.

The dream is over, and Teddy awakes, a disappointed little boy. Picking up his bundle of papers, he wends his way once more towards the enchanted spot, and gazes forlornly at the billboards. A kind-hearted stranger in passing notices the boy, and realizing how much such an event meant to him in his boyhood days, hands Teddy the price of a ticket. The boy is surprised and wild with joy. Thanking the donor for his goodness and waving his cap in the air, he rushes away to join the merry throng entering the canvas where he willl see his dream realized.

PRINTING UNCLE SAM'S PAPER MONEY (June 22).—Special facilities were granted the company for making the pictures in the Bureau of Engraving at Washington, and the film shows the entire process from start to finish, besides illustrating the actual printing of the paper money, stamps, etc., used in currency. It also shows the method adopted for the destruction of defaced bills.

THE TWINS (June 18).—They lived in the country with their father, a widower, and although they were poor they were happy. Then the father died and there was no one to love and care for the two little girls. Their neighbors were poor, and none of them would undertake the care o fthe children, and for a time it looked as if they would be sent to an institution. Their pastor, however, in searching the father's few effects, found the name of a distant relative, a rich resident of New York, and wrote asking him to look after the children.

The Uncle, a selfish old bachelor, could not see why he should be bothered, but he finally consented to receive one of the girls. The other, he said, must shift as best she could. Each child wanted the other to have the good fortune. Finally the minister picked out the one who was to go to New York, and sorrowfully led the other to the orphan asylum, which was designed to be her home.

In the city, the little girl soon won the love of her cross old uncle, but he was too shame-faced to admit it. She was happy in her new life, her one regret being that she was separated from her "twin," but she hoped that sometime they might be brought together again.

The child in the orphan asylum mourned constantly and at last ran away. She hunted up her sister, who received her joyously, smuggled her into the rich house and hid her away in her room.

When two children determined to be as little nuisance as one, they can accomplish it. As the twins looked exactly alike it was possible for them to divide up the good times, and some meals gruff old cousing ate with one child and some with the other. And the one who dined oraged for the other.

Gruff old uncle, on his way to bed one night after a midnight cigar, stopped to look into his little niece's room, to see if she was all right. He never would have admitted that he would do so, nor that he was growing mighty fond of the bright child who made her home with him. The fact is that he bent over the bed tenderly. Then he started with surprise for there were two sweet faces on the pillow and they looked exactly alike.

Before he had solved the problem, the twins awoke. Pitifully they admitted their crime and begged him not to separate them again. The stern old man gazed at them, the men who had known him for years would have been surprised to see the tender look on his face.

"I was just beginning to realize," he said, "that a little girl had won a place in my heart. I don't know which of you it is, but I guess you are equally guilty. Send either of you away? I'd like to see anybody try it."

Down in Wall Street some time later, where gruff old uncle is a power, a broker was telling a group something that interested them and it had nothing to do with stocks or bonds either.

"I was up in Central Park to-day," said the broker, "and there I saw him. He had two little girls, twins, just alike and they were all feeding squirrels. He told me they were his nieces, but he could not have been prouder had they been his daughters. They are making the old man young again, and they are really fond of him."

CALLED BACK (Part One) (June 21).—Gilbert Vaughn, a wealthy young man, was suddenly stricken blind, and although his physician told him that in time they might be able to restore his sight, he chafed bitterly at his condition. While tossing about restlessly in his room one night, he suddenly decided that he would go out in the street by himself, and eluding his nurse, he stealthily left the house.

By carefully counting his steps, and feeling his way with his cane, he found for a time, that he could walk up and down the block in safety, and was much elated thereat. Finally he lost his bearings, rushed around frantically, and became more and more bewildered every minute. At last he came to a stoop that he thought was that of his own house, and he stole up the steps.

Blind though he was, there was one test which could tell him if he had struck the right place, his latch key. It opened the door, and he stepped into the hall, confident that his troubles were all over. Still he had a feeling that he was in the wrong place, and when he heard a woman playing the piano and singing he knew that his fears were justified.

Undecided whether to appeal for help or not, he stood in the hallway. The song continued. Suddenly he heard a gasp and a groan. The music ceased suddenly and the piercing cry of a woman rung out like a frightful change from melody to discord. In the excitement of the moment Vaughn forgot that strength and courage could avail him nothing; but stumbled into the room, eager to aid the woman. He fell over a body on the floor, someone grabbed him, and he heard the click of a revolver. Then he called aloud, "Spare me, I am blind."

The assasins satisfied themselves that he told the truth, and led him out of the house, after he had taken an oath never to betray them. As a matter of precaution, they conducted him far away, and then turned him loose in the street. Later the police found him and took him home. Vaughn feared to tell his story, for he doubted if any one would believe him. Sometimes he thought himself that it was a dream.

The work of skilled physicians bore fruit in time, and Vaughn's sight was restored. He searched all over London, hoping that chance might lead him to the house again, but in vain. Yet often and often his thoughts turned to the crime, and the song of the woman that had suddenly turned into a piercing cry of horror. He wondered who the victim might have been, but could not solve the mystery, so as time passed on, he was more and more convinced that it had been a dream.

(Part Two).—Gilbert Vaughn, while temporarily blind, stumbled into a strange house where a man was slain, and would have perished himself had it not been for his affliction. The men in the room took him to another part of London turned him loose and he never could locate the house again.

Later Vaughn's sight was restored and he went to Italy for a pleasure trip. There he was smitten with love at first sight when he saw a beautiful girl at prayer in a cathedral. He did not know who she was, but often thought of her, and on his return to England was surprised and delighted to meet her one day on the street. Obeying an impulse, he followed her and found that she lived in a lodging house with her old uncle, and a woman servant who never left the girl out of her sight. To be near his divinity, Vaughn engaged rooms in the same house, and was at last able to make her acquaintance. He found her to be strangely apathetic, but his passions knew no bounds and he announced to the uncle that he was a suitor for the girl's hand. The uncle, after satisfying himself that Vaughn was rich, consented, on condition that the marriage be celebrated immediately. After the ceremony, the uncle disappeared, and Vaughn found to his horror and despair that the woman who now bore his name was apparently hopelessly insane.

A shock restored her reason in time, and through it the mystery of the murder, heard by, but not seen by Vaughn, was revealed. The victim was the girl's brother, and she was in the room at the time. The shock drove her mad, and her uncle, the accomplice of the real slayer, cared for and protected her, never dreaming that some day his sin would find him out. He permitted her marriage to Vaughn, knowing she would be well provided for, and did not recognize him as the man who had stumbled into the room, crying "spare me, I am blind."

The real slayer in the meantime had ingratiated himself with Vaughn on the plea that he was the madwoman's brother. He called one day to find that vengeance had overtaken him, and that the two persons he regarded as his dupes, were the ones who could fasten the chains of justice tightly around him. The wife, restored to reason, found her husband was the one man in the world, and reciprocated the unselfish love he had long had for her.

ECLAIR.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING (June 10).—Mr. and Mrs. Consumer find that they have no food in the house. It is salary day, so they depart for the market which is a monopoly and presided over by a syndicate representing the goods they controlled. Their motto is "Our prices, all we can get." This syndicate is composed of kings, thus divided: Milk, butter and eggs, coal, bread, sugar, meat, clothing and tobacco. At this market there is a great gathering which finally thins out to the few who have enough money to satisfy the grasping kings.

The various types of consumers buy or try to buy their necessities at exhorbitant prices. The kings are greedy and cruel.

Finally unable to bear these impositions, the people become impatient and resolve to do some thing to repair their wrongs. The kings have a reunion and make a mound of their bags of gold, which they worship. It is transformed into the God of Greed, around which they group and command the people to cease their complaints.

A meeting of the discontented people is in progress when the painting of Justice comes to life and joining them, asks them to tell their complaints, and she, thoroughly aroused, issues an indictment for trial against the wicked Trust Kings.

Uncle Sam executes the warrant much to the joy of the consumers. He repairs to the market where the Kings are having a jubilee—arraigns them—calls upon the people to carry out the orders of Justice, points to sign which has changed to "Justice Triumphs at Last." The mob seizes the kings and hustles them off to the bar of justice. The kings, handcuffed, are now arraigned before Justice. Uncle Sam enters as the people's lawyer, and in a short time (with the overwhelming evidence of their rapacity), has the jury pronounce them guilty and sentenced to hard labor for life. The people destroy the God of Greed and now that prosperity returns a few weeks later give a jollification feast at Mr. Consumer's house. In the meantime, the guards lead the kings, in convict garb, to their labors which they do very lightly. They overcome their guards and escape. While the feast is at its height the kings repair to Consumer's house and like a lot of vultures attack Justice, drag her from the house and make her a prisoner. The noise disturbs the merrymakers, they go out to ascertain the cause, are horrified to find Justice gone. In the meantime the statue of the God of Greed has been reconstructed. The kings drag Justice before it and completely suffocate and obliterate her under bags of gold. The kings return to their thrones. The angry people rush on to see the old order of things re-established and can only show their sorrow and misery. Justice is seen behind the bars, handcuffed, awaiting deliverance. Mr. and Mrs. Consumer are at their table again hungry, all food gone. Uncle Sam appears, they appeal to him, he leads them forth and pointing up, shows them the promise of the future. Old glory is seen waving and then Uncle Sam indicates that they may remedy matters by choosing from one of the presidential candidates of the different parties whose pictures are thrown upon the screen.

THE RUSTIC MAIDEN (June 13).—Nell Knickerbocker, a wealthy heiress, returns to New York after four years study abroad, to find that the daughters of her friend, Mrs. Van Kleeck have been so spoiled by luxury and good times that they are unbearable. The talented Nell promises to cure them, by masquerading as a country cousin. She pays a visit to the Van Kleeck household, and by her "rustic" manners and pranks completely conquers the haughty spirit of the disagreeable daughters. They take her to dinner parties, theater and a dance; at every place she monopolizes the attentions of the men despite her pretense at awkwardness and "greenness." In the end she shows her musical ability, and wins for herself a husband who she is sure does not marry her for her money.

A LUCKY FRIGHT (June 16).—The scene takes place on a rich farm. The farmer and his family have just finished their dinner. As it is harvest time, all go to the field, leaving the grandfather, who is a paralytic, with his twelve-year-old granddaughter at home alone.

Shortly after their departure, a knock is heard at the door. The child opens the door and is frightened on seeing two tramps, who ask for a glass of wine. The men go out and the little girl hastens to lock the door. She hears them go through the yard and inspect the place. Seeing that the old man and the child are alone, they plan to rob the house. The tramps crawl in.

Having searched the place and finding nothing, one of the tramps goes to the armchair and roughly grabs the child and tries to force her to give them money. The helpless old man watches the intruder beat the little girl. A shot rings out. The father has returned to the rescue. The fright has strengthened the old man's will and suddenly cured, rises and embraces his grandchild.

LUXOR AND THEBES, EGYPT (June 16).—Nothing is more emotional than the view of all these splendid ruins, which visualize all the splendors of the past civilization. The temples of Luxor and Thebes; the gigantic tombstones of Ptolomey and the Pharahos; the collosal statues of Mennon, all make a very interesting picture.

RELIANCE.

A DAY AT THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS (June 12).—This film is one of the most interesting natural history subjects produced by the Reliance Company. It is a full reel subject and is devoted entirely to the unique and the unusual animal features that are on exhibition in the largest and most talkel of zoological gardens in the world. One feature is the Clarence Mackay collection of heads and horns, which is one of the finest collections of the kind that has ever been on exhibition before. One of the moose heads shown has an antler measurement of 76 inches from tip to tip.

Among the animals featured are Siberian Tiger, American Bison, American Elk, English Fallow deer, Axis Deer, the Gnu, the Musk Ox herd, which is the only one on exhibition. The Kangaroo, the Zebra, the Giraffe, the Wart Hog, Bears, Asiatic Cranes, Sea Gulls, South American Condors, and the Peacock.

Gentlemen:—

Your sign received and well pleased with it. Think it is the best thing in the way of a program sign I have ever seen. It is only a matter of time when all the first-class vaudeville and moving picture theatres will be using a sign of this class, as I have figured I can more than save the cost of your sign in six months. The letters show up very plain and is surprising how quick one can change the wording in the entire program. In fact the entire sign can be changed while they were taking the list of acts and pictures to the printer.

Yours truly,
(Signed) FRED. COSMAN, Mgr.,

WHAT AN ASS (June 14).—An erratic old gentleman makes the life of his servants so unbearable that finally nobody will consent to wheel him out in his bath chair. He is finally obliged to employ a very intelligent donkey. The latter takes the place of a servant in an admirable fashion. However, he also finds it impossible to tolerate the old gentleman's ill humor, and proceeds to show the old fellow that he is not the only one who can make himself unbearable.

MUSIC MAD (June 14).—Professor Jerry Pinkapong has a daughter, who, like himself, is very musical. The musical daughter has a musical lover, and the trio hold musical assemblies at "The Musical Box," the residence of Professor Jerry Pinkapong. Paddy Fiddlesticks induces the fair musician to elope with him, and the result is one amusing medley of situations, musical and otherwise.

COMET.

MY WIFE'S BIRTHDAY (June 3).—Gratz Brown, a broker of wealth and position, renounces the follies of life, and marries a beautiful girl, some years his junior. Business cares absorbing much of his time, his young wife was frequently left alone. One evening, with a burst of enthusiasm, she exclaimed, "If I only had a dog, it would at least be something to talk to."

The remark at the time was not particularly appealing, but Mr. Brown remembered it. In due course, Mrs. Brown's birthday arrived, and extraordinary efforts and plans were made for its celebration. Gifts innumerable from a multitude of admiring friends were sent with cards of congratulations. Her husband's gift, a magnificent diamond necklace, was received by her with expressions of great joy.

Recalling her wish for a dog, Mr. Brown visits a kennel, and selects one of "bull" species. In the midst of the attendant excitement occasioned by the many beautiful gifts, the dog is delivered at the brown mansion. All else is immediately forgotten. Falling upon her knees, Mrs. Brown literally smothers the animal with caresses. Mr. Brown stands near regarding the demonstration with a dubious thoughtful expression.

Subsequent transpirings convince him of his folly, for from the time of the dog's advent into the household, Mr. Brown was entirely forgotten.

"Buster" (for that is the name by which the dog was christened) was everywhere in evidence. When at meals, Mrs. Brown fed him from her own fork the choicest morsels of tenderloin, etc.

Mr. Brown's "Good morning, dearie," was met with aggravating abstraction on the part of his wife, until at last, driven to despair by her indifference, he resolves to disenchant her with dogs. He visits the fancier and purchases a number of dogs, which he has delivered to his home. Their arrival only seems to widen the breach between him and his wife, for her time is now wholly occupied with her pets, and poor Brown is entirely forgotten.

Struck with a brilliant idea, he visits a foundling asylum and adopts an infant. He arranges for its delivery, and in due course the child is taken to the Brown home. The young wife is busily occupied feeding and caring for the dogs, when the nurse, carrying the child, is ushered in. Seeing the infant, she at once makes an effort to take possession of it, but is restrained by the resourceful Mr. Brown, who offers her the alternate of "dogs" or "baby."

With a woman's intuitive feeling, she exclaims, "Give me the baby." And the dogs are returned to the original owner.

THE ISLE OF STRIFE—CUBA (June 8).—This film begins with a beautiful picture of historical old Morro Castle, which majestically towers above us as we enter port from the sea. It also visualizes a magnificent panoramic view of Havana Harbor, showing Cabanas Fortress, and other points of interest. There is a close-up view of the Havana Cathedral, where the remains of Christopher Columbus were interred for many years. There are scenes from the Columbus and Central Parks, two of the most interesting and beautiful spots to be found among the scenic exceptions of the world; there is the Nine Students Monument, showing inscriptions which every Cuban loves and reveres. This picture also reproduces a carnival on the Prado, where one hundred thousand persons, fantastically garbed, celebrate the independence of Cuba once each year. The picture also takes us to a more remote part of the island, and shows the arrest, imprisonment and trial of insurrectos. There is a most complete and instructive reproduction of the largest sugar plantation in the world, in full operation. From the cane fields to the hemp sacks, this wonderful industry is minutely pictured. There are trainloads of sugar cane being emptied into the troughs which lead to the crusher: the crusher in full operation, separating the sugar from the cane; the evaporator through which a million gallons of water pass every hour; the government expert testing the syrup, and a score of other interesting and instructive views which are part of the daily routine of this beautiful land of unlimited opportunities.

POWERS

NO CHILDREN WANTED (June 19).—In "No Children Wanted" there is a sparkling travesty in which is depicted the trials and disappointments of a father with a large flock of young children who sets out to lease a flat. He arrives with his wife, travel stained and weary, buoyed up with hope. He applies to several landlords and janitors, who show him scant courtesy, as they take mental stock of his nine children and inform him that "No children are allowed" in their apartments. The family wanders from one apartment house to the other only to be refused. Night is approaching and they seek refuge in a park, and the comforts of a bench, where they sleep until morning.

As they are arousing from their slumbers a friendly policeman appears on the scene and takes in the situation. On being questioned the head of the family unbosoms himself and pours his tale of injustice into the ears of the officer. The copper meditates and then has an idea which he imparts to the troubled father. Acting on the suggestion, the husband leaves his little flock in seclusion and boldly applies for apartments in an imposing looking house. He is questioned and answers that his family consists of himself and wife. The landlord is eager to have him for a tenant and arrangements are made on the spot.

The family moves in. The father and mother pass inspection, but are worried. Barrels, boxes, hampers and, last of all a refrigerator are brought in by the truckmen. The door is hastily closed and from every receptacle a head pops out. The children emerge and are cautioned to be quiet. Noses are counted and after a search the baby is found in the icebox.

The mother of the landlord is an invalid and is confined to a wheel chair. She is left in a room and the curtains catch fire. The children smell the smoke and effect a heroic rescue. The landlord discovers the children and is about to evict the family when he learns of the act of the volunteer fire company and decides to allow them to remain.

TWO GAY BOYS (June 22).—Billings and Meeker are two brow-beaten husbands who are dominated by their wives. The women are leaders in a "Rights for Women" club, and they neglect their household duties to show the way to their sisters in the cause. On the day of an important meeting of the club, Billings and Meeker are forced to listen to harsh words from their wives and are in rebellious spirits and ripe for mutiny. The occasion presents itself for an attractive looking young woman calls on Billings soliciting funds for a charitable institution. Billings is favorably impressed and besides his wife has just given him a curtain lecture. The girl is susceptible to flattery, and before she leaves, the henpecked husband has arranged a little supper, at which Meeker and her chum are to be guests. Telephones are brought into requisition and the affair is arranged to the joy of the two husbands.

They repair to the restaurant appointed and have an uneasy half hour waiting for their fair guests. In the meantime their wives are spellbinding the members of the club at a stormy session. The young women arrive at the cafe and the dinner proceeds. Meeker succumbs to the influence of the wine and becomes tipsy. Just about this time a young man calls and takes the solicitor and her chum away. Billings pays the check out of Meeker's wallet and lugs him to his home, lying him on a couch. Mrs. Billings returns and Billings eludes her. She sees Meeker just as his wife calls. Billings bursts in and accuses his wife of an affair with his friend. The women indulge in a hair-pulling match whereat the men wax jubilant, and the scene closes with the husbands getting good and even with their wives.

SOLAX.

FOUR FRIENDS (June 19).—"Sport," the dog, was uneasy that morning. Before Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins left the house to go to the factory, he looked at them with entreaty—as if asking them to stay at home that day. But Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins were poor folks and it was up to them to provide for their three children. So they left the house regardless of the entreaties of their intelligent dog.

Tom, the eldest of the three children, was the "big brother" and he watched over the younger children with great care. That particular morning, however, after playing in front of the house, he grew impatient of little Gertie's slowness in the game and left her alone, while he and his sister went into the house to play. While romping about with "Sport" Gertie was attracted by the strains of a violin and a fine voice. She soon found that the violin and beautiful voice belonged to a wandering Italian couple. While she listened with admiration to these tuneful Italians, a purposeful glance was exchanged between the couple. They asked Gertie to follow them and promised to teach her how to play.

"Sport" soon finding that Gertie had disappeared, ran into the house and stirred Tom and his sister with his loud barking and pulling. Tom follows the dog and thus discovers the disappearance of Gertie. Tom with the aid of the dog, gets on the scent of the abductors. He hits upon a plan. He decides to disguise as a tramp boy and accompanied by "Sport" he enters the Italian's shack and asks for water and food. In return he promises to give them an exhibition of the trick work of his dog. The Italians are pleased with the dog's work and ask Tom to remain with them. The dog and boy remain with the Italians and the remainder of the story deals with the clever plotting of Tom and the sensational feats accomplished by the dog, until the four friends are finally reunited.

INDIAN SUMMER (June 21).—Mr. John Courtley and his son come to the country to occupy their new home. Mr. Courtley is a widower and his son is on his vacation from the University. Widow Smith, at the time of Mr. Courtley's arrival, is in front of the house trimming her rose bushes and vines. She turns around with a glad and hospitable smile ready to greet her new neighbor. To her great astonishment she recognizes in him her shoolday's lover.

Both are now in the Indian Summer of their existence. They have spent the best part of their lives. But—their environments have a poetic effect. The spirit of youth enlivens their slow-beating hearts. Once more the fire of a love that was once extinguished, is now rekindled. The old folks renew a courtship which culminates in a marriage.

It wasn't very easy for them to do their love-making. Mr. Courtley's son and Widow Smith's daughter looked with askance upon the old folk's growing attachment. They did everything to prevent their parents from being left alone together, but "love finds a way." The old folks outwit the younger ones and elope, much to the chagrin of young Mr. Courtley and young Miss Smith. However, they both find consolation in each other's arms.

GAUMONT.

WHEN THE LEAVES FALL (June 18).—Yvette, the popular favorite of the Italian Opera Company, is in the opening scene of this picture singing Gluck's "Orpheus" when she is suddenly seized with illness, which causes her to fall prostrate on the floor and the audience is completely grief-stricken. Some of the more thoughtful ones, however, rushed to her assistance, among whom were the first violinist and the Marquis of Montreville, both of whom prove to be madly infatuated with the cantatrice.

The Marquis, realizing the extent of the sing-

WHAT THE PHILADELPHIA PAPERS SAY

PHILADELPHIA RECORD

"OLIVER TWIST" MOTION PICTURES

"Oliver Twist"—Lyric.

The motion pictures recently made of the principal incidents in Charles Dickens' story of "Oliver Twist," so adapted as to give in as clear and as concise a way as possible an idea of the novel, were shown for the first time in this city last evening at the Lyric. Nat Goodwin, who in the recent revival of the play made from the novel was seen in the role of Fagin, was pictured in that role in the films, and a generally competent cast of players gave him support. Every spectator last evening appreciated the fine photography in the motion picture presentation. All the pictures were very clear and there was little, if any, of that oscillation that is often an annoyance to onlookers at an exhibition of projected pictures. A lecturer gave some idea in advance of the exhibition of the nature of the story, and he also instanced some of the famous players who have been seen in dramatic representations of the play made from the novel. Occasional comments also came with the revealing of the pictures, although for the most part explanations were hardly necessary, so intelligent has been the visualizing of the piece. The films, presenting the novel in five installments, were so nearly perfect as to warrant more than the usual commendation for careful photographic work. Goodwin at the conclusion of the presentation, is seen in his customary garb, on the screen, bowing his thanks to the spectators.

PHILADELPHIA EVENING TIMES

OLIVER TWIST MOVIES WITH NAT GOODWIN AT LYRIC THEATER

Five Photographic "Acts" Show Vivid Scenes in Dramatic Story.

Oliver Twist, in five photographic "acts," and with Nat Goodwin as Fagin, drew an interested audience to the Lyric Theater last night. While Goodwin is the only member of the all-star cast which has been presenting the revival of Charles Dickens' famous novel in New York to pose for the films, all the parts were cleverly portrayed.

One of the first things noticeable in the production is the fact that the films are remarkably distinct and without that oscillation which frequently proves annoying and hard on the eyes. A lecturer preceded the display of films, explaining the nature of the story, although this was hardly necessary, so completely is the plot set forth in the pictures.

"MAKE-UP" IDEAL

Goodwin's make-up for the part of Fagin, who taught youth to steal, is ideal. From the birth of Oliver in the workhouse, until the finding of the will which restores him to his own, the entire story is given in an accurate, careful manner. The scenes of horror in Fagin's den, the incidents in the home of Mr. Brownlowe and Miss Maylio, the murder of Nancy, the hanging of Sykes, and the horrible death of Fagin, are especially vivid.

Throughout the production particular incidents and situations were given in such a way as to illustrate the plot of the novel, although shown without regard for sequence. William Mason, the lecturer, furnished a clear, concise summary of the story, which permitted even those unfamiliar with the work to follow it closely.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Dickens Pictures with Goodwin as Star at Lyric.

Remarkably dramatic and telling is the motion picture play of Dickens' novel, "Oliver Twist," which was seen at the Lyric Theater last evening, with Nat C. Goodwin as the sinister Fagin. The production is noteworthy for its completeness and highly important incidents, such as the magisterial viciousness of Justice Fang, and the death of Agnes, are filmed with resultant clearness as to plot.

The atmosphere of low brutality and petty criminality is also admirably conveyed, and the characters are, for the most part, enacted picturesquely and in such a manner as to make them stand out vividly. Mr. Goodwin's impersonation of the fawning old vampire is a superb and congruous piece of acting. The technical requirements of the motion picture art are generally observed and the photography is thoroughout beautiful and clear. The lecture which precedes the play is interesting.

EVENING BULLETIN

Moving Picture Exhibitions and Other Attractions of the Week.

A novelty in moving picture entertainment is offered at the Lyric this week in the presentation of "Oliver Twist" as a photoplay, with N. C. Goodwin in the part of Fagin. Mr. Goodwin has recently been acting this famous Dickens character in an all-star revival of the play in New York, and while he is not accompanied in this "Movie" reproduction by the same players that have been appearing with him in the regular performance, all the other parts are well taken, and Mr. Goodwin's vivid portrayal of the old Jew, who instructs boys in the ways of crime, is highly effective and interesting. The continuity of the story is well preserved, the acting being so skillful that no point is missed, and the staging is complete in detail and picturesqueness. The performance is preceded by an explanatory lecture by William Mason, which, while seeming somewhat unnecessary, owing to the familiarity of the story, is unusually well done, Mr. Mason being a good speaker, wholly versed in his subject.

Attention! Feature Film Exchanges and Owners of Features!

We are now running a strictly feature house and can use six feature productions every week. Will be pleased to hear from all feature exchanges, all owners of feature productions, either stationed or traveling. We can use old or new features, matters not how old, if the prints are in good condition. We require plenty of billing, synopses, banners, etc. We are also interested in one of the largest and most costly Ind. theaters in the South. If your features are O. K., your prices close, your service good, you can get plenty of business by getting in touch with us. Write us to-day, giving list of features you can supply, quotations, condition, number of reels to production, advertising matter you furnish—in fact, all details.

OUR LEADER

"Here It Is"—Mr. M. P. Manager
You've been looking for it for a long time

The Tropical Breeze fan appliance does the work of purifying and perfuming the air in your theater.

This is the only fan device on the market to-day that thoroughly deodorizes, purifies and perfumes the air without obstructing any of the air from your fan. It will give your patrons and employees a wholesome and healthy air to breathe. It will perfume your theater with a most agreeable odor, not in the least offensive to the most refined taste. It will please your patrons and they will come again.

It can be used on revolving, swinging or stationary fans or fans inclined at any angle. Remember that the hot summer days will make the air in your theater very offensive without this device. No theater complete without this device.

Price of Tropical Breeze Fan Appliance, handsomely Copper Oxidized, complete with fluid, $4.00. Hot days are here. Write to-day for full information.

Abraham Lincoln said:

"You can fool all of the people some of the time and some of the people all the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time."

So, with a moving picture machine, a poor one may please "some of the time," while the best machine pleases "all the time."

Power's Cameragraph

has pleased "all the time." A few reasons for this are:

FRA DIAVOLO

THREE REELS

ADAPTED FROM AUBER'S CLASSIC OPERA

Louis Reeves Harrison, of the World, says the production of FRA DIAVOLO means the beginning of a new era in Moving Pictures.

$25,000 PRODUCTION

RELEASED FRIDAY, JULY 12th

Two hundred people were used in the production of this massive feature. Scenery, properties and costumes were made to order. The production has all of the characteristics of an era-making feature. It is excellently staged, superbly acted and perfectly photographed. The principals in the cast are all stars and popular actors. The story holds the interest and its moments of suspense are full of thrills; a big sensational climax makes the grand finale. The action is full of variations. Tragic incidents follow scenes full of humor. Released through FILM SUPPLY COMPANY OF AMERICA.

COMET

Release Days, Monday and Saturday

The one big sensation in the Independent Motion Picture industry to-day is the remarkable improvement in quality shown by the New Comet Company. All we ask of exhibitors and exchangemen is to see for yourself what the New Comet films are like before passing judgment. Don't take anybody's word for it—such criticism may refer to films produced under the old order of things—everything is different now at the New Comet plant—it's the present and not the past that concerns you. Get in line right away and see one or all of the following pictures and you will be very strong for the New Comet releases.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 15th (1,000 FEET)

AN INTERRUPTED WEDDING

A riot of laughter and surprises. Gorgeously staged, superbly acted and magnificently photographed.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 17th —A "Corking" Good Western Reel— (1,000 FEET

A PLUCKY RANCH GIRL

Plenty of Cowboys, Indians and good chases. A real story of primitive days in the Far West.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 22nd (1,000 FEET)

THE TALE OF A RUBBER BOOT

A Comedy with dramatic interest. The odd theme employed in making this picture takes us from a Florida Orange Grove and Carolina Turpentine Still to the White Light section of New York. Perhaps the most expensive negative produced by any Independent Manufacturer this season, but it is at your disposal as a regular release through any of the Film Supply Company Exchanges.

RELEASED MONDAY, JUNE 24th —Comedy— (1,000 FEET)

A REALISTIC REHEARSAL

Every exhibitor south of Mason-Dixon line (and north of it for that matter) will find it to his advantage to get busy advertising this picture at once. Miss Mabel Paige, the most popular young actress in the South and Southwest, is featured in this film. Southern theatregoers will turn out in full to see their pretty little favorite in a photoplay that fits her to perfection. Get your S. R. O. sign ready when you announce this Star and feature film. The Mutual Film Corporation of Washington, D. C., Atlanta, Ga., New Orleans, La., and Dallas, Texas, handle our prints in the South.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JUNE 29th Here's a Saturday Western for You (1,000 FEET)

THE WILD ROSE OF THE HILLS

Full of thrills and sensations. A novel idea—unlike any Western story you have ever seen. Watch for the synopsis of this picture. It's a thriller.

RELEASED MONDAY, JULY 1st (1,000 FEET)

JENKS AND HIS MOTOR BOAT

A Nautical Comedy produced by the entire Florida Company. The Explosion Scene is a scream. The St. Johns River proved an ideal spot for the necessary scenic detail of the story.

RELEASED SATURDAY, JULY 6th (1,000 FEET)

A HEROINE OF PIONEER DAYS

Another hair-raising, breath-taking Cowboy—Cowgirl—Indian feature. One of the best our Western Company has sent in. Just what you need for Saturday.

EXTRA - - EXTRA - - EXTRA

On Monday, July 8th, the Comet will release one of the most extraordinary one-thousand-foot films ever produced. The title is not announced at this time for reasons that will be given later. Get your programme in shape to handle it.

Sold only through Film Supply Co. of America. One-sheet posters with each release. Send for Comet literature.

THE INGRATE

Mr. Morris, a banker, adopts Ralph Marsdon. The boy becomes dissipated, and on the guardian refusing him more money, Ralph forges a cheque. Being discovered, the ingrate steals more and poisons his benefactor. A nurse is arrested, but Marsdon becomes crazed, confesses his crime and takes the place of the innocent girl.

Released Saturday, June 22nd, 1912 Length 1056 Feet

THE RUNAWAYS

Harry and May Nugent settle down in Brooklyn. They were a devoted couple, but May's experience at housekeeping was shy. This caused a quarrel and Harry flew to Sea-Ville on the 10:30 train to cool off. May does the same on the 11:30 train and by chance they are assigned adjoining rooms at the hotel. A burglar trying the doors frightens them and in the semi-darkness they rush into the hall. The guests of the hotel flock to the scene and are astonished to find a man and woman in demi-toilet in each other's arms.

Released Monday, June 24th, 1912

OVER THE DIVIDE

Burton, a prospector, hearing that his mother is dead, and not having enough money to go east, takes what he has to the gambling table and loses. Despondent, he takes to the mountains, and unfortunately drifts into the cave of a road agent. The sheriff and posse secure both men. They are about to be hanged when Nell Carter rides up, cuts the ropes, and Burton and the girl escape.

"THE NIPPER'S LULLABY" Monday, June 17th

A bouncer. The baby brings joy to the young father's heart. Hard times come. He gets into bad company. Falls from a pier and is picked up by an outgoing steamer and carried to a foreign port. He makes his way back to his home a wiser and better man, eager to make amends for the past.

"HER DIARY" Tuesday, June 18th

Records of a whole life time. An old lady's son is arrested on a false accusation. She is forced to sell her home to a wicked brother to secure means to defend her son. The son is sent to prison. She goes to the poor-house. Her brother dies and makes her his heir. She returns to her old home. She finds comfort in her diary. Each entry appears before her in a vision. As she reads of her son's imprisonment he returns to comfort and cheer her life.

"CHASED BY BLOODHOUNDS" Wednesday, June 19th

This is a great run by Bunny. He helps a poor coon, who steals his chickens. He employs a bloodhound to trace the thief. Instead the dog chases Bunny. He escapes and dreams that he is still pursued by bloodhounds. Its got go and action to it. (Split reel) Auto races in Santa Monica.

"HER BROTHER" Friday, June 21st

The right thing in the right place. He goes West. His sister's beau goes later. They meet, but don't know each other. Her brother robs her beau. He is arrested. When his sister's beau finds out who he is, he tells the sheriff it was all a mistake. Later when his sister and her beau are married, he visits them, a respectable and successful man.

"THE GAMBLERS" Saturday, June 22nd

A trump card. In the game of hearts, a young debutante beats a designing woman who tries to rob her of her fiance. He is her partner, of course, and helps her win.

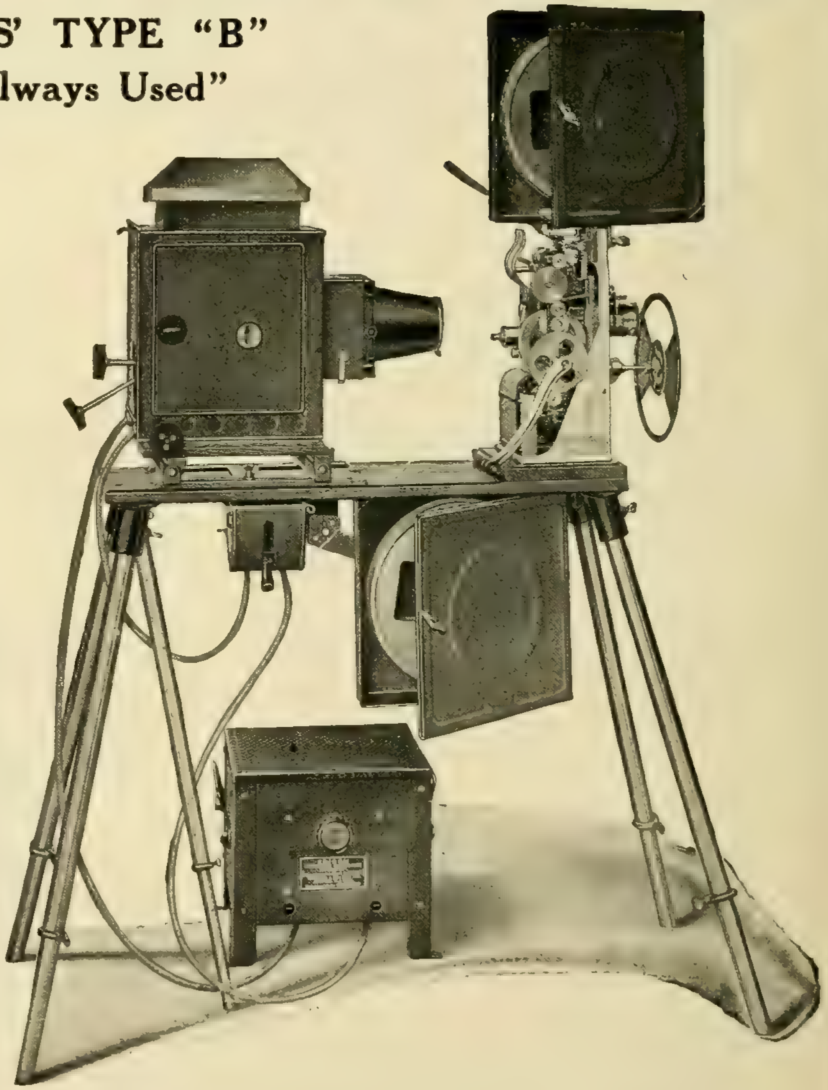
THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

UNDERWRITERS' TYPE "B"

"Once Used, Always Used"



Your success in the motion picture business depends on the degree of amusement and satisfaction you give your patrons.

The flickering pictures and frequent interruptions for repairs that are characteristic of a cheap machine are also discouraging to an audience.

The Edison Kinetoscope has had the advantage of all of Thomas A. Edison's study and improvements. There is no unpleasant flicker, no wear on the films, no danger from fire, no complicated mechanism. The Edison builds patronage and keeps it. Ask us for a catalog and a copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

Facts and Comments

BISHOP LUDDEN of Syracuse comes out strongly against the exhibition of films, even of religious subjects, in the churches of his diocese. The venerable prelate—he is seventy-seven years old and in ill-health—expresses the belief that the churches should be kept for the sacred purposes for which they were built by the faithful. The bishop's fire was drawn by a dispatch from Rome stating that the Vatican, in response to a request from several American bishops, has consented to allow motion picture representations of religious subjects in churches on condition that the sacred host be removed during the entertainment. The Bishop goes on to say: "There seems to be a spirit of irreligion prevalent and a deplorable tendency on the part of a certain element—a large element, by the way—to turn the purposes of the church into travesty."

THE WORLD is sorry to see Bishop Ludden take issue with so many of the bright minds of his own denomination. Pastors of Catholic churches were among the first to recognize the value for good in the moving picture—in its possibilities for driving into the minds of men and women and children the old-fashioned morality; in its peculiarly forceful qualities for imparting to the consciousness a respect for those gentler attributes that make the home sweeter, saner and happier.

The mechanics of the motion picture are adapted to vivid portrayal of the supernatural as are no other human agencies. The world moves on. It is reasonable to expect that a few of the ultra-conservative for a time will be unyielding in their opposition to the new and the unusual; but in the end even they will acclaim the power for human betterment that lies in the judicious use of the motion picture.

EXHIBITORS in Niagara Falls, N. Y., have won a signal victory in their fight for the showing of proper motion pictures on Sunday. The fight was forced on them by a number of clergymen who made the question of Sunday pictures the topic of several sermons. From the evidence at hand it does not appear that their objections were directed against any particular pictures—indeed, the character of the pictures shown did not enter into the issue at all. The clergymen seemed to think that the showing of any pictures on Sunday was legally and morally wrong. A majority of the Board of Aldermen yielded to the demands of the clerical reformers, and by a majority of one adopted an ordinance prohibiting Sunday exhibitions. The Mayor of the city, Philip J. Keller, vetoed this ordinance, and the Sunday exhibition still continues in Niagara Falls. Mayor Keller entered the lists on behalf of the motion picture with the lance of logic and an Homeric shield of common sense. He takes his law from the decisions of William J. Gaynor and his facts from his own observation. It is very evident that he has the sentiment of his community with him.

What we rejoice over particularly is the action of the local exhibitors. They exercised such judicious care in the compiling of their programs for Sundays that even the hypercritical clergymen could find no weak or vulnerable spots. They could not have upheld the position of the Mayor more effectively. Better still, they recognized the importance of their fight beyond the limits of Niagara Falls. We like immensely the spirit of the letters they have written to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. In asking us to speak of the Mayor's veto in the next issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, one of the correspondents expresses the hope that "it may help other cities that may have this issue against them." Another exhibitor writes that he heard so much willful misrepresentation from the lips of the agitators that "his respect for the clergy is gone." The spirit of "one for all, and all for one" breathes in all the letters and shows that exhibitors everywhere are ready for organization and all projects of mutual helpfulness.

"GO to the —— Theater; all our photoplays are thoroughly censored." This is the text of an advertisement put out by an exhibitor in a large city. It is in the newspapers and in the street cars. We are sorry for this exhibitor. A man who apologizes to the public for either himself or his business cuts a pitiful figure. It reminds us of the cured leper calling attention to the fact that he has become clean once more. This type of man regards the approval of the police as the highest earthly commendation. He could not live comfortably or decently without being thoroughly censored. His own conscience and judgment are in a state of chronic atrophy. He is the antithesis of a man with principles and convictions. Such abject servility as finds expression in this "thoroughly censored" advertisement breeds a sense of real nausea in every true American.

DURING the past few weeks feature films have held exclusive sway in four of the principal theaters in Philadelphia. Their success in a financial way has been unquestioned. To an intelligent observer this fact, however, means far more than an immediate material gain to individuals. For one thing it may be pointed out that the press of Philadelphia treated all these pictures seriously and had them reviewed by competent critics the same as any other big theatrical offering. The press of the Quaker City deserves the thanks of every friend of the motion picture for this fair and decent attitude. We know of no other city in the first rank where the press has risen to the greatness of the subject. Here in New York the papers almost without exception refuse to take the pictures seriously. Their ignorance of the great wonders of modern cinematography is dense, solid and more or less willful. The mission of yellow journalism is not to encourage and to uplift, but to besmirch and destroy.

Take a look at the audiences attending the exhibition of these feature films in Philadelphia's big theaters. They are in every respect the equals of the best audiences in the country. As far as the behavior and appearance of the audiences go they might be looking at a classic play by America's foremost actors. It is plain that their interest and attention are thoroughly aroused. There hovers about them that subtle air of refinement, so noticeably lacking in New York audiences, which have no intervening shades between the manners of the Bowery and Fifth Avenue. There is no doubt that the continued success of these feature films was largely due to the intelligent reviews of the press. They brought the most desirable patronage. Every night thousands of the best kind of theatergoers left these theaters with a new and bettered opinion of the motion picture, its achievements and its possibilities. They possess all the zeal of new converts and will make countless friends for the motion picture in their own strata of society. It is well to note that these feature films were all essentially educational; i. e., scenic, classic and allegorical. We predict a great wave of renewed popular enthusiasm for the motion picture and believe that the last few weeks in Philadelphia mark its early rise.

The friends of the picture in motion who have looked forward to and labored for this happy consummation cannot help reading the Philadelphia reviews with feelings of mingled amusement and satisfaction. To us the expressions of wonder and delight in these criticisms are a source of pleasure. It is evident that the "high-brow" critics were startled when they discovered how different from their own preconceived notions these "moving picture shows" were. They write as if they had just made a most important discovery. They are lavish in their praise of the motion picture as a beneficial factor in the world of education and amusement, but in their judgment of the particular merits of each feature they show fine critical ability and discrimination. Here is the most pleasing aspect of the thing. It means that they recognize a really great feature film and place it on a par with other regular theatrical attractions.

Nor must we overlook the importance of the work of the lecturer in the presentation of these feature films. On this point the critics are unanimous. They agree that the lecture is second in interest to the pictures alone. They demand a high standard of education and eloquence in the lecturer. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD alone of all journals devoted wholly or in part to cinematography, either here or abroad, has continually emphasized the importance of the lecture. To the further successful development of feature programs the lecturer of education and ability is indispensable. This kind of work is found to attract a desirable class of men, professional men and men with scholarly instincts and the proper academic training. No one recognizes these facts more keenly than the progressive exhibitor. He insists on the best service and, failing to get that, will do without the lecture rather than descend to a lower level.

Degrading the Pictures

ONLY as recently as the last issue of THE WORLD, exception was taken to the new and objectionable reference to the moving pictures as the "movies"; especially is this slang name being paraded in an unseemly way in certain of the daily newspapers, in which language of that kind seems peculiarly appropriate. The latest and still more unseemly use of this offensive slang appears in this same New York daily with the following heading:

"FREE MOVIES ARE O. K.

"IT IS NO CRIME IF THEY ACCOMPANY THE BEER AND HOT DOGS."

It needed no prophet to predict that a slang name is soon connected with common and detracting associations, hence the recent protest; such a rapid fulfilment of that direful anticipation was, however, not contemplated.

"Movies," "beer," "hot dogs"; if these three associate a license is not needed, only because the "beer and hot dogs" are paid for and the "movies" are free; or, in other words, moving pictures may be associated with evil companions, in repulsive surroundings and under questionable conditions without an exhibitor's license if the technicality of paying at the door is omitted. Such is the decision of the Supreme Court in a test case from Coney Island, the Court holding that an admission price must be charged to come under the law.

Anyone who knows anything about the prevailing custom at Coney Island also knows that while "admission free" is true, it is a costly matter before getting out. No one is allowed to stand; therefore all must be seated at tables and drinks must be bought. Let anyone try to test the question of seeing the pictures without charge (through the purchase of drinks) and they will soon find themselves escorted to the door; it is impossible to find a greater fraud than that hidden under the cloak of "free pictures."

The status of this question may be legal, but it is decidedly immoral.

Where is the noble band of public censors? Are they still "straining at a gnat—and swallowing a camel"? A drinking scene in the picture is rightly disallowed, but the picture in the lowest and vilest of drinking places is protected by law.

Not only are the pictures degraded by the evil and abominable associations, but, still worse and worse, the pictures are used as a bait to attract tens of thousands of women and children into dark, unhealthy drinking places where they are compelled to purchase drinks which they really do not need. Herein two great evils are created, one the pictures allure into improper places, then compulsory drinking is a result. A still further "trick of the trade" is enforced, the exhibition is made as short as possible (about two films of four subjects); during the last film tables are cleared, and people must either retire or "order another round."

In the majority of instances there is at least one alluring picture which the children wish to see a second time; this means that "second round of drinks" the management demands must be bought, the result being: an expenditure of from two to three times the actual cost of admission to a licensed place, a shorter exhibition, degrading surroundings and the damning evil of drink, the blight of manhood forced upon whole families, all as a result of the most modern use by evil agents of the valuable cinematograph under the guise of "free movies."

No protest can be too vehement, the moving picture is too valuable to be degraded; its mission is to uplift, educate and amuse. It must not be made a part of anything abominable to the highest public good; neither must it be hurled into those depths the precipitous sides of which are made slippery with the slime of slang.

Last and most important, the pictures must not be used as an attraction, a bait, an allurement, a trick or a device to cheat the law, degrade humanity and lead children into sin and vice.

Let it be that those who, for the time being, have won this legal victory, shall prove that they have lost in a great moral battle which shall recoil to their total annihilation.

The question is one for the license-paying exhibitor, for the lover of the clean picture for the moral and upright citizen everywhere. Conditions permitting such an evil must be changed at the earliest possible moment. The man who made the appeal and gained this victory has rendered a service to the State in thus drawing attention to his nefarious existence, thereby creating that demand which must result in his total extinction.

W. H. J.

The Outlook.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

WHAT is to grow out of the various schemes and intrigues of factions in the picture play game is largely a matter of concern to those shuffling and cutting the cards. There is probably in progress a gradual elimination of the unfit, but exhibitors and the public are only interested in results.

What are the possibilities in store for the photodrama?

Laying aside consideration of business combinations and their regulation by ethical principles or petty management as the case may be, it becomes evident that we are dealing with an art in process of rapid development, a peculiar art that is nothing more or less than an attempt to narrate by delineation and imagery what is true or fictitious, usually in dramatic fashion that it may grip and hold human interest. It is also evident to men of ordinary common sense that photoplay values should be real rather than forced, that natural and solid growth in quality is preferable to artificial methods of compelling the exhibition of what is below public taste.

There is nothing to be achieved in the long run by obtaining control of distributive exchanges or even of the principal theaters if the offerings made are not what the people want. The bedrock of the whole business is artistic production, and the best line of effort is that of advancement. Like the instruments used in its making, the photodrama is subject to constant improvement, something new will be evolved every day during its history, and the time seems to have arrived for those in quest of the treasures the art contains to open their eyes to its infinite possibilities rather than devote so much attention to wrangling over a division of what has fallen like manna from Heaven.

What is going on now is not the perfecting of early and raw attempts to present a play without words. It is rather a scientific demonstration that there is a great deal in the way of entertainment and instruction yet to be accomplished by this means, the full measure of which has not been sounded by any living man. The best producers have only arrived at the threshold of a House of Mystery where they have enjoyed a glimpse of future delights and countless millions of reward for those who proceed with care and intelligence, never to be reached by those now scrambling for all the petty profits within reach.

Any man whose point of view is high enough for him to peer into the future cannot help noting that the trend of public amusements is towards those conducted absolutely on the level. Crooked race games have gone by the board with the policy shops. Clean sports in the field and the air draw hundreds of thousands; stale theatrical performances are deserted for those in the open because a few wiseacres tried to fool all the people all the time, and those who attempt to control while perverting dramatic entertainments of any kind will eventually empty the playhouses if their methods are allowed to prevail.

Watch out for the virile efforts of new blood to bring about superior conditions in photodrama production. The moment really great plays appear, stirring releases of artistic settings and high poetic value, the public will flock to see what is refreshing and invigorating without excessive expenditure of patience and with about as much regard for what is now being done as those who enjoy the automobile feel for the bicycle. Audiences are often called fickle when they are simply weary of what has lost its appeal from painful monotony.

We are all fond of variety, particularly when it leads to some form of self-betterment; we like the stimulus of mental suggestion; we enjoy what satisfies progressive enlightenment. No man, however, can provide entertainment that is universally attractive who has his nose down to the ground trying to smell out every bit of loose change in the old order of things rather than apply himself to the development of what has already paid handsome dividends. There will be more profits than ever in the business when the efforts of those who are brainy enough to improve with it are called out.

Men who are now applying themselves heart and soul to the scientific and artistic departments instead of shuffling and cutting in the policy end of the game will be the owners and producers of tomorrow and leave estates paying heavy inheritance taxes to the state long after the mere shufflers and cutters are worm-eaten and completely forgotten.

The business is too big for many of present self-assumed importance—some of them pulled off shrewd deals while the manna was falling and others are merely commercial accidents—and it is probably vigorous enough to survive those who fail to regard it or treat it as a beautiful art well worth preservation for other than commercial purposes. The essential principle to be observed in the conduct of affairs is to study the tastes and requirements of our people and then offer what is well worth their expenditure of time and money in places of entertainment for all classes. Some high-fliers in national affairs just now afford a radiant illustration of how dangerous it is to get away from the universal heart so far that its pulsing cannot be heard, that it is better to stay down on earth and learn that the throbbing human organ can beat with warm and generous sympathies. The greatest man in moving picture evolution will not be the one who gets most out of it for himself, but who applies its interpretations to the betterment of manhood, womanhood, motherhood and childhood.

Love and friendship are not purchaseable—they are only responsive to gifts in kind—and so those who expect to achieve popularity in this golden opportunity afforded them must emerge from their shells of primitive self-preservation to a broader comprehension of what can be accomplished with the resources now at their command. Their productions powerfully affect the impressionable minds of children; in these children is implanted a tremendous hereditary power; photodramas give that power scope and material to work upon; the photodrama should nourish and encourage what is finest in those young gardens of thought; and any man who deliberately destroys what mothers have created in months of pain and built up in years of self-denial ought to be eliminated from the business if not from the face of the earth.

I apply the cautery to such a producer because that is what a festering sore needs. The moment this business becomes one of destruction it will be overthrown. There is only one policy worth considering: that which is progressive, that which keeps pace with human enlightenment. That is the only policy which will meet with approval among the clean-minded men and women of this country. Making it pay is a matter of good judgment, and if that judgment is applied to the present outlook the New Art will soon strive for its highest ideals.

More good pictures and less bad politics.

OUR prediction that the Memorial Year of Dickens would bring forth great cinematographic tributes to the greatest of English novelists has been amply verified. In less than six months from the date of the memorial we have seen a most honorable rivalry among some of our best producers in rendering Dickens into motion pictures. About one-half of the greater works of Dickens have been filmed with more than ordinary success. In view of these successes it may well be asked: Will the novel of the future be written in motion pictures?

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

THE members of the National Convention Committee here are working hard and zealously for the success of the August meeting. Wm. J. Sweeney, the chairman, stated during a recent interview that everything is progressing very satisfactorily, and that the interest centered on the event is growing more widespread every day. Every mail brings in numerous queries about the convention and requests for information concerning membership in the league. Many of these letters are from the Pacific Coast States, the Southwest and the far South and East.

Exhibitors throughout the country are showing their interest by taking complimentary space in the program and are forwarding five dollars each for that purpose. Mr. Sweeney is highly gratified at the fraternal disposition shown, and that it is substantiated by a financial consideration as well as by good will. He also stated that program space is in good demand by the manufacturers of supplies, supply firms, etc. He desires to impress on the latter that every facility within the power of the convention committee will be afforded them to display their products advantageously, at a moderate outlay for space. The entire 18th floor of the La Salle Hotel has been reserved for such space, and as the convention proceedings will be conducted on the 19th floor, manufacturers, supply houses and their agents will be in close contact with exhibitors while the convention lasts.

Mr. Sweeney and Robert R. Levy left the city for Cleveland on Thursday, June 13, to attend a meeting of members of the league, during which the question of insurance of picture theaters and other matters that will be brought before the National convention in August will be considered.

Revue De Luxe Pictures at the Lyric.

The Lyric was opened with a fine program of pictures on Sunday evening, June 9, by S. L. Rothapfel. Notwithstanding the trying handicap of being unable to fix his stage for the presentation before the day of opening, owing to the running of the Durbar Kinemacolor pictures up to Saturday night, Mr. Rothapfel had everything in excellent order; and, although there was only a rush rehearsal of the musical accompaniment for the pictures, the talented members of the orchestra played the music with fine spirit and with a nice timeliness of theme.

I was much struck by Mr. Rothapfel's accompaniment for Pathe's Weekly No. 24. The opening scene, the Elks' Parade in Indianapolis, was enlivened by strains from "Auld Lang Syne" and a "Hot Time in the Old Town," the large audience applauding the appropriateness. Waltzes in spirited tempo and other selections were played for the scenes immediately following. The G. A. R. Memorial Day Parade in New York was accompanied by a fine march and national airs, during which bugles and trumpets were well handled. The scene showing the Sultan of Turkey escorted by troops was heightened by the playing of the Turkish Patrol. When the "Fashions" section was flashed on the screen, the orchestra burst into "You Great Big, Beautiful Doll," amid loud laughter and applause.

The sound effects during the presentation of "Trawler Fishing in a Hurricane" fairly captured the audience. The shriek and moan of the wind, the swish of the flying scud, and the resounding chug of heavy seas, as they were shipped, were all reproduced with a realism that carried the spectator into the throes of the storm. "The Tale of Two Cities" was most impressively presented, the theme of the story being artistically sustained by the music and effects.

Following is the opening program, which will be retained for the week:

Overture	William Tell
"The Lord's Prayer (Gaumont), Ave Maria (Gounod)
Calf of Gold (Faust)	Mr. Anderson
"Trawler Fishing in a Hurricane" (Eclipse)	Effects
Annie Laurie	Miss Miller and Quartette
"Shriner's Parade at Los Angeles" (Selig)
Ah, So Fair (Martha) Mammy's Song	Mr. Kimball
Pathe's Weekly, No. 24
Sextette from Lucia Sweet and Low	By Quartette
"Buster's Nightmare" (Pathe)
Slides, by Underwood and Underwood, of current events.

INTERMISSION.

"The Tale of Two Cities" (Vitagraph)......

The vocal selections were admirably sung and encores were insisted upon throughout the presentation.

For the week beginning Sunday, June 16, the following film subjects have been selected by Mr. Rothapfel: "Pathe's Weekly No. 25; "Ten Days With U. S. Battleship Fleet" (Edison); "Niagara Falls" and "Cavalry Tests in Belgium" (Pathe); "Life Among Savage Tribes of Borneo" (Pathe); "Alkali Ike's Auto" (Essanay), and "Lady of the Lake," in three parts (Vitagraph).

Despondent Exhibitor Takes Life.

Despondency over his loss of $1,100, through the purchase last January of the Ravenswood 5-cent theater, caused Gustave A. Dortmund to commit suicide on June 4, by hanging himself from a beam of the ceiling in the playhouse. The victim lived at 2151 Lincoln Park Boulevard.

Dortmund purchased the theater from James Heiss, 813 Oakdale Avenue. He paid $200 down, and notes for the balance were to fall due in a few days. It is said he was unable to meet these obligations. Heiss found the body on the floor near the entrance to the theater.

Dortmund left three letters and three notes, in which he explained the reason for his act. One of the letters was addressed to his wife, Mrs. Johanna Dortmund, another to his son, Charles Dortmund, and the third to George Steiner, 312 East Forty-first Street, a friend.

Notes which were unaddressed read:

"Please don't let the newspapers talk about me."

"Please, finder of this, leave me at the undertaker's and don't take me home."

"To you all: Such a business—that Ravenswood theater. Loss $1,100. You cheap skates."

Excellent Management at Picture Theater Fire.

To the tune of "Fiddle Up" most of the big audiences of the Warrington Opera House, Wisconsin Avenue and South Boulevard, Oak Park, walked quietly out of the building, while a few left more hurriedly when they learned on the night of June 4 that the house was on fire.

The blaze, which was caused by crossed electric wires under the rear of the stage, caused a loss of $500 before firemen could extinguish it. None of the patrons was injured.

The fire was discovered by H. E. McManus, manager of the theater, and he and a stage hand fought the blaze in the basement with a hand chemical apparatus, but were unable to check it. An alarm was then sent in.

McManus discovered the fire when a few wisps of smoke arose through a crack in the stage flooring back of the curtain. Calling Walter Grigg, the assistant manager, both went down to investigate. They found the rear of the basement ceiling on fire and sent Grigg back to prevent a panic in the event of the smoke becoming thick.

After turning in the alarm, McManus returned to the stage and made the announcement that a small fire was burning in the basement. The orchestra played and the moving picture machine, operated by Frank Cavanaugh, was kept in motion until the playhouse was cleared.

The Warrington has been leased for the summer by George Hines, owner of the Lyda Theater, on West Lake Street. Mr. Hines states that he did not lose a single performance by the fire. For the good of the picture theater and the greater safety and comfort of his patrons, Mr. Hines would do well to install an indirect lighting system in both of the houses controlled by him.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Between forty and fifty members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Wisconsin recently entertained, at the Plankington House, Milwaukee, a party composed of M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, C. M. Christianson, of Cleveland, and Wm. J. Sweeney, Robert R. Levy and Louis Schindler, of Chicago. Prominent among the Wisconsin members present were Thomas Saxe, Mr. Phillips, president of the Wisconsin League, and Mrs. Klein.

The Chicago office of The World has received a booklet from Watterson R. Rothacker, manager of the Industrial Moving Picture Company, which treats of the subject, "Why to advertise with moving pictures." Mr. Rothacker gives excellent and irrefutable reasons for such advertising, and the work abounds with complimentary letters from railroad companies, chambers of commerce, municipal progressive associations, advertising agencies, various manufacturing companies, etc., for which his company has made films. "The best advertisement in the world will never be written, because moving pictures are the superlative advertising medium and exceed the limitations of any pen" is one of the many epigrams encountered in this carefully written, well edited, handsomely illustrated and attractive booklet.

J. M. Crane, a telegraph editor of the Tribune, this city, was a visitor at the World office last week. Mr. Crane has been a great admirer and close observer of moving pictures for several years, and now intends getting a house of his own. Mr. Crane does not intend to build a theater, but is desirous of renting a house in a desirable locality. He believes in an exclusive moving picture program and, in case he is successful in finding a suitable house, he will confine himself strictly to pictures.

The Consolidated Amusement Company, of Charleston, W. Va., has under way a new theater that will seat 1,200 people. The house when completed will cost $40,000. The structure will be provided with all the latest modern improvements. The theater will have a handsome front and the interior will be ornately decorated. The front and decorations will be built by the Decorators' Supply Co., of Chicago.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League
OF AMERICA

LOOKS LIKE A BIG MEETING.

Indications That New York State Convention Will Be Success—City Local Prepares Fine Program.

FROM the amount of mail being received by M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, the enthusiasm in New York is very strong for a state organization. Several New York motion picture exhibitors have already sent in their applications for membership in the new State League. Exhibitors in every part of the state seem to be making arrangements to attend the convention. The New York picture men, hearing of the good results accomplished through the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League in other states, have become aroused to the fact that Providence only helps those who try to help themselves and, as every other line of business is organized, it naturally follows that the Motion Picture Exhibitors of New York should get together in one grand convention at the Union Square Hotel, New York City, on the 19th of June, and perfect a strong organization.

Several letters have been received asking where the writer can send his membership fee and to whom it is to be sent. All communications should be addressed to M. A. Neff, President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, in care of the Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth Street and Fourth Avenue, New York City, N. Y., as Mr. Neff will be at the above hotel on the 17th or 18th of June making arrangements for the convention.

As there are several exhibitors in the State of New York who belong to Ohio State Branch No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, they are requested, if possible, to attend the convention that they may be transferred into the New York State organization. Letters have been received from several New York City exhibitors stating their willingness to co-operate with the state organization, which will be affiliated with the National organization.

Every exhibitor in the State of New York is not only invited to attend this convention but is urged to do so, as every exhibitor is welcome. A splendid time will be had and business that directly affects the interests of every motion picture exhibitor will be transacted. There will be several visiting members of the League from different states. Remember the date, June 19th, 1912. Place of meeting, Union Square Hotel, Fifteenth St. and Fourth Ave., New York City, N. Y. Time of meeting, 10 o'clock a. m.

CITY ASSOCIATION WILL ENTERTAIN.

Elaborate preparations for the entertainment of out-of-town exhibitors who attend the New York State convention on June 19 have been made by the New York City Exhibitors' Association. An entertainment committee has been appointed by the local organization consisting of the following members: Arthur D. Jacobs, chairman, 30 Union Square, New York; Harold W. Rosenthal, secretary, Apollo Theater, 368 East 149th Street, New York; Grant W. Anson, Star Theater, 136 Third Avenue, New York; William A. Landau, Audubon Theater, 181st Street, near Audubon Avenue; Adolph Baurenfreund, Bushwick Park Airdome, Bushwick and Myrtle Avenues, Brooklyn; Samuel Trigger, 813 Sixth Avenue, New York; Sidney Ascher, Nicoland, 162nd Street and Third Avenue; Louis Rosenthal, City Hall Theater, 93 Park Row.

This committee will have charge of the task of entertaining the visitors and has planned an appealing program. Following the first business session of the convention at the Union Square Hotel, luncheon will be served.

At 5 o'clock p. m., or the conclusion of the convention, there will be an auto trip to Coney Island, where, at 6 o'clock, a banquet will be served at Henderson's Restaurant.

From 8 to 10.30 o'clock the party will attend a high-class vaudeville entertainment at Henderson's Music Hall.

At 10.30 there will be a cabaret show and other seaside entertainments, after which the party will return to New York by automobile.

Members of the New York Association are working tooth and nail to make the convention a success. They propose to show exhibitors from up the state that they are right up to the minute. A large appropriation for entertainment has been made and up-state exhibitors, officers of the National League, city officials and representatives of the trade press will be taken care of in royal manner.

Provision has been made to accommodate all members of the local organization who desire to join in the festivities, but they will be requested to purchase tickets, for which the nominal price of five dollars will be charged. These tickets can be obtained at the headquarters of the local organization, 136 Third Avenue, or of any member of the committee, whose addresses are given above.

Aside from the importance of the meeting, this program of entertainment should prove an attraction to the exhibitors of the State, and the New York City exhibitors don't care how many of them come.

Selig Working on "Count of Monte Cristo" Picture—Other Interesting News.

"THE Count of Monte Cristo" is the big production which is now occupying the attention of the entire Western branch of the Selig Polyscope Company. In many respects it will be the biggest thing the Selig Company has ever done—artistically, financially and in point of the number of performers occupied in the production. It is so big, in fact, that William N. Selig thought it worth his while to make a special trip out from Chicago to see it put on and he is now here.

The company has been at work on it for about two weeks and it is nearly half finished. It will be a three-reel production and a fit successor for "The Coming of Columbus." Mr. Selig and the members of his staff expect it to cause more comment and bring the organization more credit than the Columbus picture.

Although the actual production was not begun by Colin Campbell, who is directing it, until two weeks ago, the preparations have been going on for several months. There were thousands of costumes to be made and about a month ago James Magee, the manager, went to San Francisco where he chartered a full-rigged sailing vessel.

The regular company, with nearly 200 extra people, spent two days at San Pedro last week making the shipboard and smuggling scenes off the coast and the celebrated scene in which Bosworth scrambles up on a lonely rock and confides to the world that it is his. On one of the two days it rained all day and the actors worked in a drizzle. There were fears that the day's work might be spoiled, but the tests came out all right.

Extraordinary precautions are to be taken to make the photography notable. One of the interesting details in this connection is that barrels of special spring water have been hauled to the studio to be used in the developing solutions, and the dark rooms have been overhauled in order that the conditions for development may be ideal, No statement concerning the cost can be be made yet, but it will probably exceed that of Columbus.

Independent Companies Line Up.

The first local sign of the new arrangement which will prevail under the policy established by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company was observed here upon the return from New York of Fred Balshofer, head of the Bison Company, who is to be the Western manager for the Universal and will have general supervision over the Bison, Imp and Nestor forces here. Within twenty-four hours after he returned a force of carpenters was put to work preparing one of the buildings on the Bison Company's property at Edendale for occupancy by the Imp office force. It will take about two weeks to make the required alterations and then the Imp offices will be moved over from Brooklyn Heights on the opposite side of town. The Imp studio will probably be moved to Edendale soon afterward and the two companies will be side by side, not far distant from the Nestor plant at Hollywood. The plan whereby the forces of the three companies will co-operate, loaning players, directors and properties to each other if the need arises, is to be put into effect here without delay.

Things in General.

Apparently the films which have been released through the local exchanges in the last three weeks or so have been above criticism, for the Municipal Board of Motion Picture Censors, which has been in operation for that length of time, has not found it necessary to suppress any. The board meets weekly in the Arrow Theater, which the city leased for its use.

There has been one change in the board in the last week. Ralph C. Daniels, the member appointed to represent the city board of education, resigned, and Mrs. C. H. Whipple, Jr., was appointed to fill the vacancy. Mrs. Whipple is the wife of Lieut. Whipple, retired, of the regular army, who is now serving as secretary of the Municipal Newspaper Commission. She has been interested for a long time in the educational possibilities of the motion pictures and was one of the supporters of the ordinance creating the board.

Another interesting aeroplane picture was taken by the Nestor Company, June 1, when Glenn Martin, the aviator who has been working with the Nestor forces, was the central figure in a coyote round-up on the big Irvine ranch at Santa Ana, Cal. About 150 men and women mounted on horses turned out for the hunt. Martin, in his aeroplane acted as scout and game driver. From a distance of several hundred feet above the ground he located the animals and then with swoops and dives drove the coyotes toward the line of hunters, where they were made short work of. Nine coyotes were bagged in about two hours and the Nestor cameramen were in at the death each time. The pictures will appear in an early release.

W. W. Hodkinson, special representative of the General Film Company, has been here all week visiting with James R. Cummock, manager of the local exchange, and marveling at the shipshape condition in which he found everything. "Hod" is a shy and secretive soul. He says he has never been interviewed in his life and the record still stands as far as anything that happened here goes. He wouldn't even say whence he came or where he is going for fear that might be technically construed as an interview. When asked whether he likes the West he swallowed his tongue and smiled knowingly. Except for his natural reticence, which made it difficult for the waiters at the Alexandria Hotel to decide what to feed him, he had a good time here.

The California Film Exchange, handling releases of the independent manufacturers, is furnishing regular service for four new theaters which have just opened. J. F. Hammond is operating a new house at Coronada; S. Horwitz is the proprietor of the New Airdome at Boyle Heights; the Neptune Theater has just been opened at Venice under the management of the Ruby Amusement Company, and the California Theater is a new business district house on Spring Street between Second and Third.

Another new theater which is showing independent pictures is the Airdome at Yuma, Ariz., recently opened by Al Beasley, who reports big business. He is booking through Miles Bros.' Los Angeles exchange.

Although the Bison people were compelled only a couple of weeks ago to divide their big company into two parts because it was growing too large to handle, they are still adding to the payroll. This week five new members joined. Miss Leaderer is to play leads and ingenue parts for Mr. Ford's company, and Miss Rae Francis has been engaged for ingenue parts under the same director. J. B. O'Brien, leads; Miss Bertha Miller, character, and Leo. D. Moloney, utility and second business, will work under Director Ince with the big company.

Something has gone wrong at the Western studio of the Lubin Manufacturing Company at Hollywood, but no one seems to know just what has happened. This much, however, is certain: the plant is temporarily closed and in charge of a caretaker. Most of the members of the company are in town, but they are not working, and Harry A. Kelly, who was director and manager, is awaiting the arrival of "Pop" Lubin, who is said to be on his way here.

The Wonderland Theater, at Third and Main Streets, has been featuring Nestor's "Foreign Spy" this week, and the results have justified the move. However, it is only fair to say that the "5 cents" sign, which was replaced for a short time by one bearing the number 10 has reappeared, and this may explain in part the box office figures.

The members of the Los Angeles Fellowship, a religious organization, held a Dickens celebration this week. The program was made up of readings from Dickens' works, the enactment in character scenes from several of his stories, and the big feature of the evening was the showing of the Thanhouser three-reel production of "David Copperfield."

"His Father's Bugle"

A Stirring Drama of the Spanish-American War by the Selig Company.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

RICHARD GARRICK and one of Selig's Eastern companies have produced a stirring drama of the Spanish-American War, under the title, "His Father's Bugle." Unlike some war pictures, where the military evolutions of large bodies of men show a lack of training and of military bearing, this Selig subject affords us scenes in which the men show the nattiness, carriage and discipline of real soldiers. This praiseworthy feature is due to the fact that Producer Garrick is a soldier himself (having been in active service during the Spanish-American War in Cuba). and to the painstaking drills through which he has put his supernumerary force.

Scene from "His Father's Bugle" (Selig).

The charge up San Juan Hill, on the top of which stands the Spanish blockhouse, is one of thrilling realism. The sham element has been well eliminated and the men drop one after another, here and there, as if struck by the leaden hail from the unseen enemy. We see the men, at a certain point, waver in the face of the terrific fire and expect to see them retreat; but the bugle sounds the "charge" and once more the well-strung line advances on the run. The color bearer falls and the Stars and Stripes with him; but it is only for an instant. The already wounded bugler seizes the flag and climbs upwards to the crest, followed by his companions in arms. The foe is routed and next we catch sight of him on the roof of the blockhouse pulling down the flag of Spain. He is about to place the staff of the regiment's colors in position, when he falls before the aim of a sharpshooter and flag and staff topple over the burning edge of the roof. No one can look at the scene beneath the tree, where he has been carried to breathe his last, without sharing in its sadness; nor can one view the affecting incident in which the aged mother receives the bugle of her dead boy, without feeling the pain of her bereavement. As she hangs it up on the nail, in front of her dead husband's photograph, we notice a delicate touch of artistic "business"—the placing of the cord of the bugle so that it encircles the top of the frame containing the photograph of her son.

Scene from "His Father's Bugle" (Selig).

The opening scene exposes a group of small boys playing soldiers. One of them, little Fred Wilson, assumes command. His father had won high honor in the Civil War as bugler, being presented with a bugle by President Lincoln himself for turning defeat into victory, by sounding the "charge" when the day was almost lost. Little Fred is, therefore, proud of the toy bugle which he carries and blows repeatedly while drilling his faithful squad.

In the sitting-room, we catch sight of Fred marching in front of his father's photograph and reverently saluting it; then he asks his mother to let him have his father's bugle, which hangs in front of the photograph, for a moment; but we see her shake her head gravely in refusal, then she takes him on her lap and tells him the story of the bugle.

This story is told in the pictures that immediately follow. The time was 1863, when Fred's mother was the sweetheart of his father. The latter marches away to the front with his comrades amid the tears and cheers of the villagers. Next we are in the midst of an exciting engagement of the Federals and Confederates, and witness the ravages of shot and shell. The presentation of the bugle to bugler Wilson by President Lincoln follows, and the scene dissolves into the sitting-room, where the mother is still talking to her boy.

The scene changes to one fourteen years later, when Fred Wilson is a young man twenty years old. It is in the year 1898 when patriotism is set afire by the declaration of war against Spain. Fred has enlisted and his regiment has been ordered to Cuba. An affecting leave-taking between the young soldier and his mother is witnessed, the latter seeming to divine that it is the last time she shall embrace her son. The close of the story has already been outlined.

Scene from "His Father's Bugle" (Selig).

"His Father's Bugle" forms 750 feet of a split reel, on which there is also a very interesting educational subject of 250 feet, entitled "Building the Elephant Butte Dam at Albuquerque, N. M." This dam is so called because of the great butte in the vicinity, which is shaped like an elephant's head. The picture shows this.

The Elephant Butte Dam is one of the largest projects of the kind ever undertaken. The project has been under way since 1908 and will be completed in 1917. Congress appropriated $9,000,000 for the purpose and nearly $2,000,000 of the amount has already been spent.

The dam, when completed, will be 40 miles long and from 1 to 10 miles wide, and the water will have a depth of 300 feet in some places. The bed covers 42,000 acres and the dam when full will hold sufficient water to cover 3,000,000 acres to a depth of one foot. The wall of the dam will be about 300 feet high and will be 200 feet wide at the foundation. Along the top when completed the wall will run for a length of 1,480 feet.

This educational film is finely photographed and should be strongly advertised. Release will be made on Thursday, June 27th.

"Tragedy of the Desert."

A Kalem Spectacular Dramatic Production Set Amid Desert Sands and the Luxuriant Palms of the Nile Valley.

EGYPT: realm of Mystery; catacomb of Ages; land inscrutable and awe-inspiring, to the beginning of which the memory of man goeth not back. Like the curious monolith which rises out of desert sands, it is a land which may never answer the question of they who delve into the origin of things. Subtile science has wrenched from its relics fragments of its history—passing notes of the monarchs and the multitudes who have peopled its vast expanse—of its greatness and its splendor, to which its temples and tombs give silent testimony, but which yet hold securely mysteries greater than those which have been discovered. Search as we will, the great question shall never be answered and there we have the reason for the world-wide interest that is centered in that strange unchanging land of the Pharaohs.

Of recent years the persistent progress of the White Man has made it possible for the tourist to venture far into that mysterious country, but the privilege may be enjoyed only by few. The pen of the explorer and the kodak of the tourist have given us an all too meagre glimpse of its wonders. It remained for the cinematograph—the motion picture—to bring to the millions who may not travel something of Egypt as it now is and, for countless ages, has been, for it is but part of the Unchanging East.

It was daring, as business undertakings of to-day are measured, for the Kalem Company to send its players so far afield; but whether or not the remuneration shall be deemed sufficient, a great work has been accomplished by that undertaking and a great boon conferred upon the picture-loving public.

The Moving Picture World has noted the appearance of several of the Kalem Egyptian subjects as they have been presented. Some of them have been of the highest educational value. The manners and customs of a primitive people have been vividly set before us in all their actualities. We have seen how that peculiar people live and where they live and, strangest of all, the manners and customs depicted are as they were ages upon ages in the past. The casual reader of biblical history may see in these pictures the verification of the times of Moses and the Pharaohs—thousands of years ago—brought almost to his fireside. Such subjects cannot fail to interest and that interest will extend and expand as the public comes to appreciate the value of the information thus brought to its hand.

Interspersed and interwoven with these Egyptian subjects are stories of more or less modern application—bits of life's comedy intended to sustain interest. Some of these stories have been peculiarly well adapted to the land in which they were portrayed—they have fitted into the landscape and the traditions and have been as if they were a bit of the life of the people. Others have been an intermingling of the modern with the ancient; none the less interesting, however, for each has carried with it sufficient of the native custom and character and all are set among the singularly contrasting scenes of the wonderful valley of the ancient Nile.

We have been carried at a step from the productive fields and the luxuriant oases to the arid and blazing sands of the Sahara; there have been glimpses of mud huts, Arab tents, groves of beautiful palms; the majestic expanse of the Nile with the jungle of reed that lines its banks. We have seen the ancient temple at Luxor, the pyramids and the Sphinx, all woven into the texture of a motion picture and—shades of Isis and Osiris—displayed in a nickelodeon. By the beard of the Sacred Pasha, it should cause Rameses One, Two and Three to shiver simultaneously in their respective mummy clothes.

But in this philistine age of ours, what care we for the sacred dust of the ancients, except as it shall amuse and instruct us, and in that those ancients do more good than they ever accomplished in their natural lives, thanks to the Kalem players.

One of those subjects, from which the accompanying illustrations are taken, is soon to be released by the General Film Company. Its title is "Tragedy of the Desert"—a modern comedy-drama in which the European mingles with the Egyptian. The illustrations, including that on the cover page, give some intimation of the excellent scenic effects that appear throughout the two reels, to which length the subject has been extended.

In a few words, the story is that of a physician, practicing in Luxor, whose wife gets into a flirtation with an Egyptian of prominence and is discovered by her husband, who casts her off in anger. In his rage, the husband seeks oblivion in the desert and is saved from death by an Arab woman. He is taken into the village and subsequently marries the woman, after the manner of her people, into whose family he has been adopted.

Long afterward the discarded wife discovers her husband, as she is making a trip through the desert with a party of tourists, and endeavors to win him back to civilization. The man seems to consent at first, but finally drives the woman from him forever. In that moment of seeming compliance with his former wife's wish, the woman of the desert whom he has espoused kills herself. It is upon this tragedy that the picture closes.

In the portrayal of the several characters the Kalem players have done full justice to the subject. Jack Clark will be readily recognized as the doctor and Miss Gauntier as his wife, for which characters they seem admirably suited and to which conclusion they might reasonably be expected to arrive. As for the flirtatious Bey, who other than Bob Vignola could he be? The Arab sheik: Mr. McGowan has performed the part so often that it has become his alter ego. So effectively has Miss Hollister concealed her charming personality in the Arab girl, it is with difficulty that she is distinguished. The acting is graceful and convincing.

Among the more interesting scenes is the garden of the hotel at Luxor, which is shown in the illustration; the verandah of the hotel at night under an Egyptian moon; the blazing desert at mid-day, and here the berserker rage of the jealous husband is best depicted by Mr. Clark as he portrays that individual choking with thirst and blinded by the glare of the sand, groping about for an escape from his anger and pain.

There is interest, too, in the Arab village and the old water wheel; the mud walls and rude dwellings of the natives which lend the charm of the unusual to the story. Altogether it is a picture well worth the trouble, because of the information it conveys. As such it will be welcomed with applause.

THE INVENTOR'S SECRET.

George Kleine announces that upon July 30th he will release a thrilling Cines drama entitled "The Inventor's Secret." The reel will measure approximately 1,100 feet, and it is full of dramatic situations from beginning to end.

The story deals with a genius who invents a new explosive, noiseless and sure in its deadly effects. A certain government official tries to buy his secret, but finds that it is not for sale at any price. Determined to obtain it, however, the official employs the services of a designing woman, who is more beautiful than conscientious, to get possession of the inventor's formula, which has taken him years to bring to perfection.

This designing woman goes so far as to pretend to be in love with the inventor. He readily falls in love with her because of her unusual beauty, and they are married. As soon as he discovers that the woman he has taken as his wife is only a spy, and that her action in marrying him was only to obtain possession of his secret, his love turns to hate, and the action in this scene is one of the most dramatic ever presented through the medium of a moving picture.

The ending of the film is a scene showing the new explosive put into practical use by the inventor, who sacrifices his own life in order to wreak vengeance on the woman who has betrayed him, and who has mocked his affections.

The inventor in the film is Mr. Guido Serena, one of the most prominent performers of the Cines Company, and a man whose personality is in itself enough to thrill the ordinary American audience. The woman in the plot is Miss Jeanette Trimble, whose charm and wonderful acting in such films as "Madame Roland," "Josephine" and "Her Vengeance" have won for her the admiration of the public at large.

MISPLACED CREDIT.

On page 1017 of last week's issue in the criticism of "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address," produced by the Vitagraph Co., it was stated upon what might be considered reliable authority that the conception and authorship of the scenario was that of Mr. James Young, whereas the real originator of the idea and production was Mrs. Beta Breuil, scenario editor of the Vitagraph Co. We hasten to make this correction because the credit for such an exquisite conception should be rightfully placed, and we are certain that Mr. Young would be the last of all persons to claim authorship of a manuscript that was not his.

THANHOUSER COMPANY INCORPORATES.

Under the laws of the State of New York the Thanhouser Company, located in New Rochelle, has filed incorporation papers at a capitalization of $400,000, for the production and manufacture of moving pictures. The following are named as incorporators: C. J. Hite, Crawford Livingston and Dr. Wilbert Shallenberger.

"Fra Diavolo."

Finished Production of Well-Known Light Opera by the Solax Company—a Three-Reel Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS three-reel production, taken from the comic opera of Auber, is remarkable for fine acting and exquisite costumes. Madame Blache presents an exceptional group of talented performers in the following cast:

Fra Diavolo	Billy Quirk
Lord Allcash	George Paxton
Lady Allcash	Fanny Simpson
Captain Lorenzo	Darwin Karr
Zulima	Blanche Cornwall

The inimitable Billy is an ideal Raffles of other days, concealing the cunning of a fox and a trust-magnate appetite for money beneath the courtly manners of a gentleman, spicing it all with a grim sense of humor—he only robs the rich—that is very "fetching." I have seen him in funnier parts, but none more finished. He is a polished villain of a type once popular with the ladies, but now, alas, gone over to the ranks of society champagne promoters or automobile agents, still robbing the rich. He winds up in a hair-raising experience that will send a thrill through the hearts of those who watch the play as well as through the gizzards of those who hold his life insurance policies.

George Paxton as Lord Allcash is the personification of grace and dignity—I wonder what he would do if called upon to play an awkward part—and holds the eye of the spectator by sheer force of engaging personality in a role of very limited opportunity. Ease and fluency of gestural expression are not in this case wholly the result of high training, but are so spontaneous that it becomes apparent that they are native. They are born in the man. His illumination of every phase of feeling does away with the necessity of explanatory subtitles; a reflection of all that is passing in his mind as an artist lies in his expressive features, an open book that all in front may read. Acting like his contributes heavily to the evolution of moving pictures into the realm of fine arts.

Now comes seductive Fanny Simpson in the role of Lady Allcash, and she looks winning enough to deserve all the cash that is coming to her with more, beside. Beauty counts even when it is cold and rigid in marble, but that of Fanny is radiant; it sparkles in her alluring eyes; it has the warm breath of a red rose just broken from the stem; its message is in every line of her face and figure; they are flowing lines, the kind that leads unripe and over-ripe Johnnies to send notes and bouquets around to the stage door. Her intense style admirably fits the part, and the acting of these three veritable artists keeps the eyes of the spectator wandering constantly from one to the other whenever they are grouped on the stage.

They are enough, but they are not all. The Lorenzo of Darwin Karr and the Zulima of Blanche Cornwall are both difficult types admirably assumed. The role of ingénue is one of the most difficult to satisfactorily fill because of the suppressed action involved. Like that of the end girl in the chorus it largely depends on looking too sweet to live a minute and saying little. Karr makes an officer of splendid figure and manly appearance, and his acting in the final scenes, like that of Miss Cornwall, adds two brilliant lights to the illustrious three, making a group of five classy performers such as is rarely seen in one presentation.

The importance of acting, the ability to make legible varied emotions and mental conditions by movement and facial expression, was recognized very late in the moving picture art, but not so late as the importance of having a play to act. Actors are now liberally encouraged and they are profiting themselves and their companies by constant improvement in their work. Playwrights are still outside of the pale of encouragement and will so remain until the adapted photodrama or photo-opera now replacing the little photoplay begins to run stale and some live producer leads the way with an original story of modern motive and power enough to sweep the strings of the human heart, when the adaptation will be relegated to its proper place, a mere step in the evolution of what is bound to be a means of expressing what people are thinking of to-day.

Fra Diavolo is as good as the rest. It is a story of other days and other people than those we know or feel interest in, and as such may be praised because of its attractive presentation. The leading character is an Italian bandit who visits taverns and similar resorts of the wealthy in the guise of gentleman traveler or studio saunterer and lays hands on all the loose change or ideas in sight. Like a high-minded author of plays, he never takes anything from anybody who hasn't got it—there is something so adventurous in the temperament of a bandit that I cannot help comparing him to a photoplaywright.

This picturesque individual of uncertain pay envelope rides up to an inn where a wealthy Englishman, Lord Allcash, and his wife are stopping to break their journey into Italy and contrives to make the acquaintance of the simple-minded couple—wealthy people are so unsuspecting in plays—by fascinating the bride. She becomes infatuated with Fra Diavolo—Billy makes him a very engaging villain—while he is strictly attentive to business. He dashes away on his restive steed to arrange with one of his numerous gangs of cut-throats to hold up the stage bearing Lord Allcash and his wife to a second wayside inn, the Terracine, where the main action takes place.

There is something doing at the Terracine. The tavern-keeper's daughter, Zulima, loves and is beloved by bold and young Captain Lorenzo, but the stern father will not permit them to marry until the soldier is able to provide something better than studio lunches for his bride. Captain Lorenzo's opportunity to make a fortune is to lay hands on Fra Diavolo, for whose capture a large reward has been offered. He will do it. He swears it. He is bigger and stronger than Fra Diavolo, but is somewhat handicapped by too much boots. He calls his soldiers and they plan to nab the bandits in their lair.

Scene from "Fra Diavolo" (Solax).

Meanwhile, the bandits get busy and hold up the stage coach. They take Lord Allcash's watch and stick pin, while fascinating Lady Allcash gives up all the jewelry she wears. She is as cunning as she looks, for she has hidden in the folds of her gown the richest gems of her collection besides wads of money such as ladies sometimes carry more remotely secreted. Of course Fra Diavolo has no hand in the game—he lets his confederates do the dirty work—and he is not "wid de gang" when Captain Lorenzo and his soldiers round them up. He goes to the Terracine Inn and there becomes a center of confidential communications.

He learns from confederates that the band has been captured. He is informed by Lady Allcash that she fooled the hold-up men—she even shows him how she did it. He sees the Captain rewarded for recovering the jewels of Lord Allcash. He notes that the brave soldier gives the reward to his sweetheart and that she tucks it in her bosom. Everybody's getting it except the famous brigand, so he skillfully plans a sweepstakes of all the wealth in sight by engaging a room from which he can successively force that of Zulima and that of opulent Lord and Lady Allcash.

Fra Diavolo succeeds in entering the room of innocent Zulima and admits two cut-throat associates by means of a rope ladder, but they are forced to hide in the young lady's closet when she comes in to retire. She proceeds to disrobe before a mirror, much to the delight of the rascals in the closet—they imitate her coquettish airs—and soon goes to bed in her nightie. The bandits enter and are about to cut her throat when there is a first interruption. Lorenzo and his soldiers have arrived and demand entrance. The brigands retire to the closet, while the innocent Zulima awakes and throws a key to the house out of her window to Lorenzo.

Lorenzo enters the room of his sweetheart, but his boots make so much noise that Lord and Lady Allcash are aroused and enter the room from the other side to make inquiries, and find the young people in a compromising embrace. The situation becomes intense when one of Fra Diavolo's clumsy confederates stumbles in the closet and draws attention to their hiding place. Fra Diavolo covers them by stepping forth into the chamber to face the music. He whispers to Lord Allcash that he had an appointment with Zulima and manages to confide in Lorenzo that he is there to meet Lady Allcash. These simple gentlemen take it all in. Each is so tickled to have it on the other that they are blinded to the truth and Diavolo escapes without attracting suspicion as to his real motives.

All goes well until next day when Lorenzo and Allcash get together and engage in badinage, each railing the other until both are infuriated. Lorenzo denounces his sweetheart and Lord Allcash accuses his wife of attempted infidelity. Diavolo has stirred up a lot of ill feeling by clever explanations in effecting his escape, but the entire adventure has netted him nothing in the way of cold cash. He has been paying his own bills as well as the expenses of two ruffians, with no net result. He decides upon desperate measures and leaves a note where it will be found by his confederates—they are now staying at the tavern—instructing them to signal him when an opportune moment arrives for a general clean-up of the entire crowd by ringing the town bell when he will promptly appear and do the trick.

Scene from "Fra Diavolo" (Solax).

The two ruffians get the note and proceed to celebrate in advance by getting drunk. In this condition they draw the suspicion of grieved Zulima, and she informs Captain Lorenzo that the strange men deserve his attentions. He sets upon them with his soldiers, finds the incriminating document from Fra Diavolo and forces one of them at the pistol's point to ring the town bell. The entire ensemble is now placed before the entrance of the inn and all the principal characters are present except the arch villain. Lo and behold, he appears in response to the signal and turns out to be none other than the attractive adventurer found in Zulima's chamber.

Fra Diavolo is not to be so easily trapped. He scatters his would-be captors and breaks for the woods. An exciting chase ensues with Fra Diavolo in the lead and Lorenzo a good second. The reckless bandit uses a rope to descend a precipice, but brave Lorenzo follows, boots and all, and a thrilling struggle takes place hundreds of feet above the water, where the slightest misstep means death for one or both of the men. The fight is a good one, it is one of the best scenes in the play, between the powerful soldier and his agile opponent on the edge of a cliff. Fra Diavolo is worsted and his body is seen bounding down the rocks. His tragic end is further indicated when his body is found, and the play terminates with a decidedly original and amusing reconciliation of the couples temporarily alienated by his escapades.

The play is a creditable performance in every respect and should rank among the most successful of its kind. It is a forerunner of what may some day delight millions who attend the little theaters—really grand photo-opera.

"MONTE CRISTO," A COMING SELIG FEATURE.

The entire energies of the Selig Polyscope Company's Pacific Coast studios are now directed toward the production of what promises to be one of the most elaborate and dramatic spectacular features ever released by the house of Selig. It is understood upon good authority that the production when completed will be more than one reel in length and the Selig people modestly say that it will be known as their classic masterpiece.

"Custer's Last Fight."

The Final Battle of a Famous Indian Fighter in Two Reels by Bison.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE greatest value of this play lies in a serious attempt on the part of Director Ince to produce an accurate account of Custer's defeat on The Little Big Horn, probably the most dramatic episode of its kind and certainly the most disastrous of our Indian battles. He has delved into the inception of events and followed the narrative beyond the tragedy to the pathetic dedication of the Custer monument, an obelisk, which marks the spot where the splendid soldier fell.

I saw this two-thousand-foot reel with its hundred or more scenes before there were any explanatory subtitles inserted, but was able to follow it without difficulty, and I especially approve of the brief, incisive pictures of action that give all that is required where prolongation might belittle the fighting. This may have been involuntary on the part of the director or exacted by limitations of space, but it is nevertheless effective, and it is very much in line with Griffith's flashing back and forth to enforce contrasts.

The story starts with the cold-blooded murder of two quiet and inoffensive white men who were amateur naturalists and had wandered into the wilds on a botanizing excursion. The bodies of the unarmed non-combatants were discovered by a detachment of Custer's men, and their thirst for vengeance was not to be easily quenched, but some eighteen months elapsed before they secured any trace of the murderer. He was none other than Rain-in-the-Face, a renowned warrior from a redskin point of view, a courageous fighter, but too boastful for his own good.

Rain-in-the-Face appeared at an agency filled with Indians waiting for the issue of rations and bragged in the presence of an Indian policeman that he had killed the two whites. General Custer, immediately upon hearing of the matter, sent his brother, Captain Tom, with a strong detail to make the arrest. Fearing to arouse the suspicions of the redmen by displaying his troopers, Captain Custer went among them personally, accompanied by four or five men, and moved about quietly until he found the powerful savage and captured him in a fierce hand-to-hand struggle amid hundreds of infuriated Indians. Only the presence of troopers who arrived opportunely enabled the captor to get away with his prisoner, for Rain-in-the-Face was a man of importance.

The murderer confessed his crimes during imprisonment and was held for trial, but escaped and went to the camp of Sitting Bull and became active in a shrewd scheme of vengeance. These scenes are very cleverly used in bridging periods of time, and the subtitles shown me after I had seen the picture help to preserve the continuity of interest. Those that would have enlightened me and will probably have the same effect on others are of this nature:

"The Spring of 1876. Sitting Bull and his hostiles ignore the Government order to return to their reservations and leave for the spring buffalo hunt."

"General Custer receives orders to drive Sitting Bull and his hostiles back to their reservation."

The audience in front is often confused if not completely bewildered by the movements of troops in a delineation purely historical and very naturally loses interest in what may easily appear to be a meaningless conflict. The Custer disaster will never cease to be perplexing to those who have any knowledge of the fighting qualities of our regular troops and the efficiency of our officers, hence the carefully arranged series of subtitles in this case will be highly appreciated. The claims that Reno was drunk and that General Custer recklessly disobeyed orders are not taken up in the play—it is manifestly impossible to discuss the whys and wherefores in a photodrama—but the causes that led to the extermination of a brave body of our men are as clearly indicated as circumstances allow, and the director is to be congratulated for his consistent and intelligent attempt to tell the plain truth so far as action is concerned.

Mrs. Custer is shown accompanying her husband from Fort Lincoln to General Terry's encampment, and bidding the warrior good-bye—the entire introduction is a careful one—then the action begins with the dividing of Custer's command. He sends Major Reno to the west and Captain Benteen to the southwest for a secret flank movement while he advances in the open, his course being north among the hills forming the east bank of the Little Big Horn; that of Benteen almost in reverse at first, then following the north course closer to the river, while Reno crossed the river, a mountain stream from three to five feet deep, to the west bank.

It is almost a pity that this dangerous division of troops is not shown on a map. Readers of history are thus enabled to grasp the situation, and I think the time is coming when producers of historical moving pictures will appreciate the necessity of giving the audience such a bird's-eye view of the field of action. We are a military people from necessity; our history has been one of unceasing conflict; we are all generals in embryo, and it would be delightful for those in the audience to scrutinize the plan of battle for themselves. We can see how it might have been done if we had been there.

We are given a very spirited view of Reno's retreat across the river after a weak and floundering attack on the Indian village. That this incompetent commander escaped at all was a matter of good luck, and the defeat of his movement was largely responsible for the elimination of Custer. The pictures of the fight in the water, while Reno was retreating in confusion before he had sustained any loss, his troopers completely disorganized in a mad rush for safety, is one of the most accurate and exciting glimpses of battle ever shown.

The first disastrous effect of this failure is seen when Chief Gall, who was principally responsible for the Indian maneuvers, is given a clue to the entire movement and gathers his most famous warriors in overwhelming numbers for the very form of concentrated attack that Custer might have attempted with success, or, at least, might have expected. Captain Benteen becomes lost in the hills and unable to follow Custer's intricate plans, intricate for an Indian campaign where dash and audacity are necessary to win the day, but finally steadies Reno's troopers by reinforcing him. No Indians had been seen by Benteen, but the sound of firing is heard and Benteen begs Reno to go to Custer's aid. Custer had come upon the entire Indian force under Chief Gall—he had been ambushed—and was already surrounded. Reno has over three hundred men now under him, half of them had not been engaged, but he is so demoralized by the retreat across the river that he dares not advance.

The situation was now about the worst that could have been devised. Custer had refused Terry's offer of four troops of the Second Cavalry and two Gatling guns; he had split up his own men until no one division was strong enough to cope with the entire body of Indians. Reno was demoralized and kept on the defensive by what proved to be a demonstration to hold him in check. Even Custer's wife was aware that the hostiles were superbly equipped with Springfield rifles as opposed to the short-range carbines of the cavalrymen, and the Indians knew every inch of the ground where the whites became lost. Worst of all seems the flank movement attempted in a broken country, when such attacks must be accurately timed to meet with success. Custer had ridden into a circle of death.

Chief Gall had crossed the Little Big Horn with his entire body of well-equipped braves, and their greater number enabled them to completely surround Custer. No one survived to tell what disposition the white warrior made of his men, but it is plain that they made no effort to leave the ridge occupied when the fight began, hence it is probable that they were attacked on all sides at once by redskins concentrating a long-range fire and provided with unlimited ammunition, upon soldiers armed with carbines and compelled to husband their ammunition.

The moving pictures show what Indians engaged in the battle of Little Big Horn generously report. Officers and troopers fight from the outset with deliberate courage, but suffer great loss as the fatal afternoon wears on and gradually contract as the whirling circle of Indians drives them closer and closer together. The mortality among officers is fearful—the Indians are acute enough to pick them out as victims. Captain Custer falls mortally wounded. Captain Keough's horse escapes from the battlefield, the only animal survivor and wounded in twenty places. At last a few grouped around Custer attempt to break through the right and reach the river. They are slaughtered to a man. Not an officer or common soldier lived to tell the story. Not all of the bodies were found, but it is not probable that any were captured and tortured to death. There was no surrender possible as long as Custer lived, and the few who survived him apparently preferred to share his fate. Every man went down fighting to the last according to the only accounts obtained from the redskins. Whatever his errors of judgment, the gallant soldier atoned for his mistakes by his heroic fight and death.

The pictured story is now projected into what followed the battle. A courier finds Sitting Bull and tells him of the victory, and there is a dance to the Great Spirit supposed to have favored the redskins. On the following morning Indian scouts report that Terry's "walking soldiers" are coming, and, three hours later, Reno and Benteen reach the field and find Custer. A little later Captain Keogh's horse, "the silent messenger," returns to Fort Lincoln, and Mrs. Custer is prepared for the worst. What that worst meant is best described by Rain-in-the-Face in his account of his squaring accounts with Captain Custer, "Little Hair," for injuries received during imprisonment.

"This time I saw Little Hair (on the field). I remembered my vow. I was crazy. I feared nothing. I knew nothing would hurt me, because I had my white weasel-charm on. I don't know how many I killed trying to get at him. He knew me. I laughed at him and yelled at him. I saw his mouth move, but there was so much noise I couldn't hear his voice. He was afraid. When I got near I shot him with my revolver. I leaped from my pony and cut out his heart. I bit a piece out of it and spit it in his face."

Longfellow immortalized this noble deed in a poem, but the moving picture account of the fight is more sensible and less sentimental. Thank Heaven! I have often wished that we could send all the poets, producers and pseudo-playwrights of the phony photodrama out to fight the Noble Redman or worse—to live with him. The Sioux Indians in the battle of Little Big Horn were terrible fighters, but aside from their bravery were as destitute of nobility as other savage races. They were merciless to the weak, inhuman in their outrages upon white women and children and were as incapable of gratitude as any body of grafters now supported by our Government. The real heroes were on the other side.

The New York Motion Picture Company's production has a final scene which contains a pretty touch of pathos. It shows the dedication of the Custer monument on the battlefield, and one of the last acts is that of a little girl. This tiny representative of the greatest civilization Time has painted upon the background of worldwide history steps forth upon the blood-red soil where progress made a splendid stand against decadence and places a wreath of flowers, herself the sweetest of them, on the tomb of him who gave his life to the preservation of what was best in this fair country of ours, a tribute to him the nation has crowned a martyr.

$30,000 PICTURE HOUSE FOR ROCHESTER.

The historic landmark in the form of a house situated at the corner of North and Lyndhurst Streets, Rochester, N. Y., which was built by George Dawson in the year 1834, has been torn down to give way for the erection of a $30,000 moving picture house, being built by the Lyndhurst Amusement Company, a firm capitalized at $50,000. The plans call for a theater two stories in height, having a seating capacity for 800 persons. The theater measures 55 feet on North Street and extends 136 feet on Lyndhurst Street. The house will have eight exits, with a lobby twenty feet wide and thirty feet deep. The front of the theater will be prettily decorated in pressed brick and marble, and thousands of electric lights will illuminate the entire frontage of the house. It is expected to be ready for occupancy on or about Labor Day, this year.

THE CANADIAN H. W. JOHNS-MANVILLE CO., LTD., MOVE TO NEW QUARTERS IN WINNIPEG.

The Winnipeg branch of the H. W. Johns-Manville Co., owing to their fast increasing business in asbestos, magnesia and electrical supplies, has found it necessary to move into new quarters at No. 92 Arthur Street, Winnipeg, on or about June 1st.

This is a six-story and basement building, 100 feet deep and 50 feet wide, and will be occupied throughout by the company's offices and storerooms. By reason of this move, a much larger and more complete stock of goods will be carried on hand than heretofore, and a larger force will be employed to look after the company's interests.

JAMES COOLEY REJOINS RELIANCE.

After an absence of several months, during which time he has been filling a special stock engagement in Rochester, N. Y., Mr. James Cooley has returned to the Reliance forces, where he will resume his former occupation of playing leads.

Large Preparations Made for Picture of Life of Christ—Interesting Scenes.

RETURNING the other day from a hurried trip to London to complete preparations for a large production of the life and times of Christ, Mr. Frank J. Marion, of the Kalem Company, brought back a lot of interesting information concerning the operations of the Kalem Company in Palestine. While in London, Mr. Marion was in consultation with Mr. Sidey Olcott, director of the Kalem players, who are engaged in this remarkable undertaking. The company, which left New York some months ago, has been augmented by the addition of some nine or more English players of note, who are to assist in the big production. The information brought back by Mr. Marion is largely of a pictorial character, and the cuts accompanying this story tell their own tale.

Director Sidney Olcott, Miss Helen Lindroth and the English players on board the Austrian liner, "Hellouan," bound from Triest to Jaffa.

The Kalem players landed at Jaffa about two months ago and traveled to Jerusalem, from which point their operations in Palestine were directed. At this writing their work is probably about completed, and it is expected that they will be heard from in London by almost any mail. The complete story of their most interesting experience in the Holy Land is yet to be told, but the pictures give some idea of their adventures.

Robert Henderson Bland, in center, has played in companies with Sir Herbert Tree, Louis Waller, Mrs. Brown Potter, and was with Lillie Langtry on her African tour. For the past three years he has been a member of Sir George Alexander's Company. Percy Dyer, on left, was with Oscar Asche, in the original production of "Kismet," and later joined Arthur Hardy in "Vice Versa." Mr. Bland will impersonate Christ in the later period of his life. Mr. Dyer will impersonate the early days of Christ.

While in London Mr. Marion took occasion to investigate the exhibition business as it is carried on by our English brothers. He discovered that they were far in advance of American exhibitors in the matter of houses. "The smallest house I saw in London," said Mr. Marion, "would seat probably 800, and they range from that number up to several thousands. Every house is splendidly equipped and ventilated, and the comfort of patrons is placed first. The prices vary and considerable attention is paid to side lines. Tea is served in all houses. There is a great business done in the sale of candies, which are put up especially for the picture business. The picture play chocolate is a favorite form of confection. The candies are put up in small packages and each package contains a portrait of a favorite picture player. They are becoming a great fad, and are sold in large quantities. The theater managers also do a big business in postal card portraits of the players, and in the lobby of every house will be found large racks of post cards, before which may be seen at any time numbers of the patrons of the house making selections from the assortment.

"The theaters are mostly all syndicated. I particularly noticed the houses of the Pike and the Electric Syndicates, each of which had a distinctive front, as is adopted by the United Cigar Stores Company in this country. The attendants are richly uniformed, the army uniform being the most prevalent, and many of the attendants are ex-army men, so that it is the usual thing to see a stalwart soldierly appearing fellow in front of the house, his breast covered with medals, which have been won by him in active service. In the matter of projection, however, we are ahead of the English theaters. We give a better picture. Our machines are kept in better condition and our operators are more expert.

Mr. Hollister, with his camera, in the Garden of Gethsemane. From the gnarled appearance of the olive trees, it may be well believed, as is supposed, that these ancient trees existed at the time of Christ. This point is visited by thousands of tourists every year.

"Regarding the big production on which our company has been engaged for the past two months, there is not much to say at this time. We will know more about it when the negatives arrive. From the information we have received here a great amount of valuable material has been secured. The company has visited the actual scenes described in Biblical history, as nearly as they are known at the present day, the idea being to portray the human side of Christ. We have made no attempt to picture the miracles of Christ. The production cannot fail to be one of the widest interest."

R. M. DAVIDSON—LIVE WIRE EXHIBITOR.

One of the callers at our New York office last week was Mr. R. M. Davidson, the well-known and highly respected manager of the Lyric Theater, Binghamton, N. Y. Mr. Davidson came to this city in the interests of his brother exhibitors, his errand being to attend conferences and preliminary arrangements concerning the convention of New York State Exhibitors, which will be held at the Union Square Hotel, New York City, Wednesday and Thursday, June 19 and 20. Mr. Davidson is the kind of man that inspires confidence. He is enthusiastic and conscientious in his regard for the welfare of the exhibitor. Mr. Davidson is distinctly not what might be called a "windy" member. He is of the kind that is quiet, modest and popular all at the same time.

Mr. Davidson is building a new theater at Lestershire, N. Y. It will be named by popular contest after the house is opened. The new house represents an investment of $20,000. It will be equipped with the most up-to-date appurtenances for exhibiting motion pictures, and will seat 650.

C. L. FULLER WITH HELEN GARDNER CO.

Charles L. Fuller, late traveling representative of the Vitagraph Co., has been engaged to represent the business interests of the Helen Gardner Feature Picture Co., recently organized. Mr. Fuller is well known in the moving picture trade from coast to coast. His energetic publicity work for the Vitagraph Co. is well known. One of his best stunts was the organization of a large party of Boston exhibitors, and bringing them to New York to visit the Vitagraph plant. That junket did a lot to put the New England exhibitors on a friendly basis, and its influence is still felt in the fine exhibitors' organization that soon followed in New England. Mr. Fuller is a good mixer, and wherever he is he usually starts something.

GENERAL FILM ELECTS NEW OFFICERS.

At the annual meeting of the General Film Company, held at the company's offices, 200 Fifth Avenue, New York City, on June 6th, the following officers were elected for the coming year: J. A. Berst, president; George Kleine, vice-president; S. Long, treasurer; Paul Melies, secretary. Members of the executive committee, S. Long and S. Lubin.

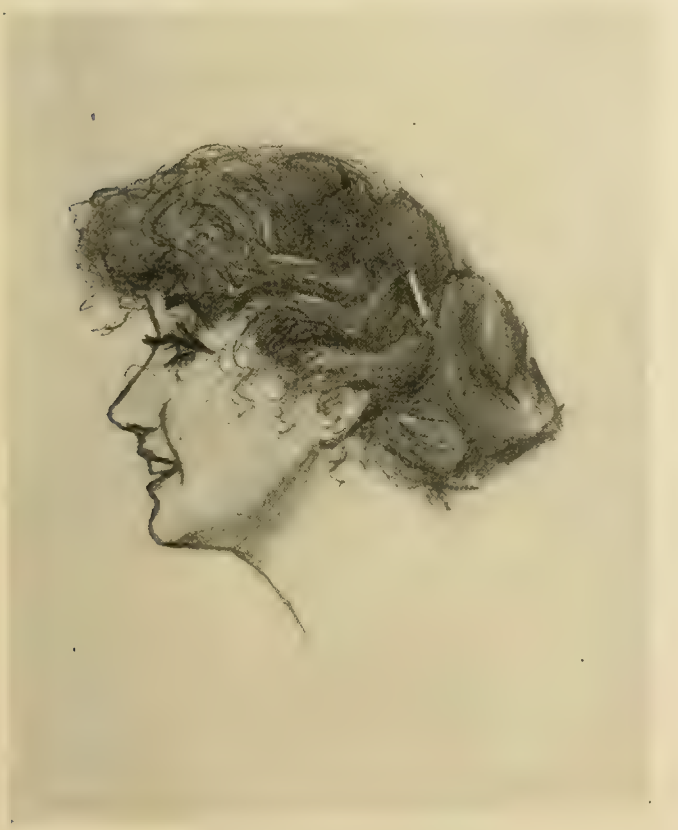
Reports to the effect that the retirement of Mr. Kennedy was caused by friction in the company is entirely without foundation.

Miss Barbara Tennant

New Eclair Leading Lady An Acquisition to the Photoplay Field. How She Hypnotized Charles Frohman.

THERE are few leading women who have entered the ranks of camera players who have come to it as well grounded in the rudiments of their profession as Barbara Tennant, the new leading lady of the Eclair-American company. The observing reader may glean from that that she is an English actress, in whose country they teach all trades and professions well.

Her engagement with Eclair is her first appearance in pictures; but in viewing her first attempt in this line, anyone would suppose that she has been a picture player for years. She knows pantomime. Her first stage appearance was in pantomime. At the age of thirteen, she appeared as a dancer in one of the London Christmas pantomimes. She continued as a pantomime dancer until she became old enough to play leads. During her time as a dancer she was also studying the mimic art, taking a special course in facial pantomime with Mme. Cavallizzi, a reputable Italian teacher, operating a school in London. Miss Tennant put in many laborious days and nights in the study of Shakespeare, especially of some of the leading characters in which she has since appeared.



Miss Barbara Tennant.
(Sketched from life by Hugh Hoffman.)

The girlhood of Miss Tennant was anything but a joyous holiday. There was little else to it but work and study, under the direction of an aunt, who was a firm task-mistress, at that time of her life. Miss Tennant has much to thank her aunt for, but while she was studying there were times when auntie was far from being popular with her talented niece. Miss Tennant is naturally adapted to pantomime on account of the form and expressiveness of her eyes. They are large and well defined. Her type of beauty, as our sketch may show, leans rather toward the Latin. This, in part, accounts for her natural pantomimic ability; but the real underlying reason is hard work. After having served her apprenticeship in pantomime and Shakespearean work, the young lady in question joined the company of Ben Greet and played many Shakespearean parts with that difficult exponent of the great poet.

Like many a good English player, Miss Tennant found conditions in England rather cramped for her expansive ideas, so she turned her face and thoughts toward America. For some time she appeared in Canada, independently of theatrical work, by giving recitals from Shakespeare and other poets, and she was much in demand. The Montreal newspaper critics are a hard lot to satisfy, but Miss Tennant gave them all an electrical thrill and sent them into raptures over her perfect work. It is really a pity that the photoplay-going public of America cannot read the highly analytical criticisms so favorable to her work in Montreal. These critics maintain that, while she is exceedingly competent in all of the tragic roles that she has appeared in, her essential field is in comedy and light society drama. She herself says that she enjoys playing rollicking comedy roles or any that require the outdoor sunshine and vigor of girlish life.

Not only had she perfected herself in pantomime and Shakespeare; Miss Tennant became noted for her beautifully modulated voice and perfect enunciation. The reason for that was that she worked as hard with her voice as with other branches of her profession. Upon entering moving picture work she had misgivings and lamented the fact that her vocal work might suffer from neglect. She fell to wondering what there might be in moving pictures to compensate for this neglect of vocal practice. Ye scribe pointed out to her that one of the benefits was that condition that Robert Burns had prayed for: "To see ourselves as others see us;" and Miss Tennant readily subscribed to that. The opportunity to see herself act, she thinks, will compensate her and help to improve her work immensely—if such a thing were possible.

Like all level-headed thespians, she is able to find parts of her own work in moving pictures that she can improve upon. Ye scribe pointed out further that there was no need of her sacrificing her exquisite speaking voice if she could arrange with the Eclair Company to spend a certain part of her time appearing before moving picture audiences, giving an evening's entertainment, showing the methods of moving picture making, and illustrating the same with pictures in which she herself appears. The idea might be carried even into some of her Shakespearean roles, with readings, by way of toning up the programme, and on the whole she could become a distinctly valuable representative of the Eclair Company on the road. The Selig Company has tried the scheme before and found it to have been a great benefit. Miss Tennant was extremely pleased with the idea, and it is hereby put up to the Eclair Company to take advantage of such a good opportunity for all concerned.

When this young lady had finished her Canadian tour, she determined to come to New York, stranger though she was, and secure an appearance. She walked into Charles Frohman's office one day and asked him for an engagement. Charles was busy that day and would have dismissed her as he is obliged probably to dismiss thousands of others who came as strangers applying for an engagement. However, Miss Tennant did the unusual. She cut off a little sample of the goods. That is to say, she suggested that she recite a poem so that Mr. Frohman might get a line on her ability, and Frohman told her to go ahead. She did not need any props, nor did she have to fix her hair, nor do any hemming or hawing of any kind. She started right in and recited "Little Boy Blue." She recited it in such a way that the astute Charles was obliged to sit up and take notice, which, to those who know the workings of the Frohman office, is, in every sense of that venerable phrase, "going some." Miss Tennant was engaged forthwith, and for two years thereafter appeared in the lead part of a play called "Seven Sisters," and later in other plays under the Frohman management. How the Eclair Company came to secure her we do not know, nor does it matter much, but in Miss Tennant they certainly have secured a finished artiste.

CENTRAL FILM SERVICE—AN IDEAL EXCHANGE.

Joseph H. Spellmire, president of the Central Film Service of Indianapolis, rode into New York, before the last full moon, to feel the pulse of the Independent film situation in Manhattan. Mr. Spellmire found time to speak of the great reputation his concern has achieved in Indiana by absolutely fair dealing and good faith with the customer. There are few exchanges that go to such lengths as the Central to study the exact needs of exhibitors. They realize that what is a hit in one man's theater is a frost in that of another, and their great aim has been to send a man exactly what he needs. This exchange was formerly what is known as a "junk" exchange until Mr. Spellmire took command, after which it became the largest Independent buying exchange in the Central States. To give an idea of the reliability of the Central Service, this exchange is supplying theaters in St. Louis, Cincinnati, and other large cities that have plenty of exchanges of their own. That is surely a great argument for the Central Film Service.

Something for the Program.

WE are indebted to Edgar M. Bosley, of Detroit, for a clipping from the News, of that city, in reference to the recent decree of the Vatican permitting the presentation of motion picture performances in Catholic churches when the Sacred Host has been removed from the altar. A part of this article, which consists of the views of a number of Catholic dignitaries, is so well phrased that it is being reproduced here for the benefit of managers who may desire to incorporate it in their programs. It should be credited to the Detroit News for May 28th. It reads:

> "The recent decision by which the Vatican has sanctioned the giving of moving picture shows in Catholic churches should surprise nobody, for the Catholic church has at all times stood for the education of the people by all possible means and in particular by pictures as being the most popular and beneficial," said Rev. Dr. Blanchot yesterday.
> "Catholic churches have always been the shrines of painting and sculpture—ever with the same object in view, to educate the people," he continued. "Moreover, in the middle ages, sacred dramatic art in the form of miracle plays was one of the favorite forms of religious education in the sacred edifices, until abuses and the invasion of profane sight-seers obliged the church to close its doors against dramatic representations, keeping only liturgical picture lessons.
> "As soon as modern science made it possible for actual events to be represented in life-simulating pictures, the church at once realized the great educating influence for historical and catechetical purposes that lay back of this scheme. So that the Roman decree in regard to moving pictures only officially sanctions a custom in vogue for the last 12 or 15 years. I may add that in rural parishes the church was often the only hall available for these purposes. These religious shows became at once very popular."

Mr. Bosley adds: "Detroit is a very good moving picture town and the spirit of animosity towards the pictures shown by some clergymen and city officials of other towns seems to be absent here."

The Selig Advertising.

The response to our request for specimens of the advertising for "The Coming of Columbus" has been rather small, but some capital work has been turned up. We spoke last week of the Bijou Dream, Milton, Pa., and since then we have seen a full page advertisement in the local paper. The foundation of the advertisement is the matrix of the full-page story in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, the heading and letter press being cut away to take in the Bijou Dream's heading, while retaining the sub-heading. The page of the local paper is not as wide or as deep as the Chicago publication, and this cutting down lets the cut layout just fit the page comfortably, leaving room for 15 single column inches of type. It makes a striking advertisement, and by using the mat in place of cuts the cost is reduced to $1.25 for the matrix and the charge for casting; which may have been borne by the paper, and which cannot be very much at best. This ingenious idea may also be employed where an advertisement sheet larger than the cut layout can be used. Eleven cuts for less than $2.50 is something more than reasonably cheap.

Taking It All.

R. B. Wilby, manager of the Academy of Music, Selma, Ala., writes most interestingly of his campaign. He says:

> "Noting your request in the current World that exhibitors send you the advertising they used for 'The Coming of Columbus,' that you might gain some idea of what advantage was taken of the matter offered by The Selig Polyscope Company, we feel that there is a chance of your being interested in the opposite proposition, the effect of this advertising used almost in its entirety, therefore this—
> "For billing we used fifty one-sheets and twenty eight-sheets, blanking the latter to the size of eights, and using them only on the more prominently located boards controlled by us by virtue of our theatrical attractions. In one paper we used the three-column electro 'ad' cut, in the other the two-column one, arranging at the same time for readers, which were obtained by cutting up the 'dope' sheets mailed out, adding to the part little matter of our own and paying especial attention to the Pope's medal. One Sunday paper used the Inter-Ocean page as a supplement, calling attention to its being unusual notice from a big daily through the news columns, while the other used Mr. McQuade's criticism as published in The Moving Picture World. A layout of six cuts, the Selig Heralds, widely distributed, a lot of talk about a special orchestra, a statement from the principal of the public schools, who had been invited to an early morning run, a few banners and cards, and an invitation to the inmates of an orphans' home—we arranging for the cars, of course—caused a gross business of close to $250, against an average of something less than $75.
> "The point that appeals to us is this: We did nothing but use the matter furnished just as we would for one of Mr. Frohman's attractions, charged a double admission—ten and twenty cents—and got away with it even though a house in Montgomery, fifty miles away, ran it for two days at five cents, and that, too, when one daily paper published there has a circulation of more than one thousand in Selma. Our advertising bills were about $75, but we set a precedent for an advanced admission for features which will make it easier next time.
> "We are grateful to you for the amount of information we are able to obtain from your department, and trust that you will find some bit of interest in this departure from the request which caused it."

That Matter of Price.

Undoubtedly there are some houses where the increase in the admission would have operated against the success of the film, but we think not the least advantage of these special reels is the fact that by making a slight increase in the admission fee for these specials, the public will be educated to an appreciation of the fact that the motion picture is something more than a five or ten cent show. If you are giving more than you have been in the habit of giving for the smaller price, it is no more than right that there should be a proper return in an increased entrance fee, and, since the entire trend of the picture business is toward a higher admission for the regular program, these specials not only bring immediate profit, but they also lead to the establishment of a higher standard of regular offering. There will always be the five and ten-cent theaters, but the twenty-five and fifty-cent houses are not very far ahead.

One Advantage.

It will be noted that Mr. Wilby handled this attraction precisely as he would have handled any of the shows the Klaw & Erlanger combination sent him. He had the advantage of a theatrical equipment and could place his matter to better advantage than some exhibitors who present only photoplay, but there is nothing to hinder the average exhibitor from building up a precisely similar establishment and working along exactly the same lines. The newspapers will take readers from an established house more readily than they will from a photoplay theatre only because the regular house has won the regard of the editorial force and has made it patent that advertising will be given at the proper time. Even those houses which do not regularly advertise can afford a display for special occasions, and most editors, save in the larger cities, can be educated to an appreciation of the fact that today the Motion Picture is even more popular than the dramatic business and as well worthy of attention. We think that in many towns of less than 25,000 population the editors of the Sunday papers would be glad to get comment and news of the pictures. Do not pick out the puffs for the films, but offer the chatty gossip. Any issue of this paper will give plenty of material for a column or more of stuff that will be read with interest by a large majority of the local paper's readers.

What to Run.

Take the copy for June 8th and turn to page 910. There is a line about Harry Cashman that will get a smile and the hint of the new Garden of Allah pictures. On the next page there is the sailing of John Bunny, the departure from the Reliance Company of Hal Reid, to form a special company of his own, and some gossip of the Sales Company changes. Page 913 gives the new double company for the Bison, the Church shows in Los Angeles and on the next page is a lot of gossip from the studios. The next page tells of the return of the Kalem players from Florida and so, on almost every page, there is an item or two to swell the photoplay column and add to the interest of the fans. The other branches of the amusement business have gained representation in the theatrical page of the Sunday papers and there is no reason why the photoplay should not find space as well. If you help your competitor as well as yourself, and the chances are that you have competitors, remember that you get the benefit, too, and if you furnish the stuff the average editor will not blue pencil a couple of extra allusions to your house and your attraction. If you can run a typewriter you'll find that it pays, or perhaps you can arrange with the editor to give him the notes and have one of his own people fix the thing up.

What the Marple Did.

The Marple Theater, Wichita, Kansas, which, by the way, has been owing us a bundle of samples for a long time, used Columbus to advantage. Manager Barie writes:

> Noticed that you inquired about the advertising of the Columbus Films and permit me to say that the Press Notices sent out by the Selig Co. were the best I ever ran across for any picture and we used over $75.00 with the newspapers, also put out a 20-piece band on a handsomely decorated float, used hand bills and all sizes of paper. The band was the greatest feature of advertising and we were the first to ever attempt that sort of advertising in this city, and allow me to say that newspapers may "talk" in some cities, but the best and surest way of getting the public is to start something good on the street, as every time we used that method we packed the house, but a cheap street ad is the poorest thing one can use.
> Would be glad to get the stuff from the papers if you want them.

We will be glad to see the newspaper ads.

How the Pastime Did.

The Pastime Theater, Brooklyn, sends in a folder and a card used in connection with their showing of the Columbus picture. The sheet is not well printed and in place of a choice of the reasonably priced cuts offered by the Selig Co. there is one cut of an Indian head that means little or nothing. The lines are well selected, for the better part, but the display and an effort to get too much on the sheet make a rather poor appearance. It's a mistake to talk too long on a sheet of paper 8 by 11 inches.

A few good, strong lines are better than four times the material even if all is of equal value; which it seldom is. Take, for instance, a line which states that "This scenario was written by C. E. Nixon." It's an interesting fact, but we do not think that any Brooklynite is going to make a special point of seeing the film because Mr. Nixon wrote the scenario. "Come early in the evening; if possible in the afternoon" means much more, even if the office does lack a supply of right and left hand "fists" and has to turn one upside down. If the Nixon line space had been added to the come early appeal it would have been much better.

We are inclined to think that the statement that "This is a brand new subject, shown here FIRST, at a big expenditure" is not a real appeal, particularly as in Greater New York most patrons probably saw the advertising when it was a first run and this house had it seventeen days late. The main point is that this reel was one of the really big things of the year and this argument should have been hammered home even at the expense of some of the other matter.

Make Things Clear.

A double show is announced for the afternoon, but just what the double show is is not announced. Some explanation of this would have been better than the glittering generality that "The glory of Columbus is greater now than ever before, and the picture serves to portray the life and character of the great discoverer in a worthy manner." That means little. The fact that there are five or six reels at the matinee, when the regular reels were probably added to the special feature, means a lot. It means matinee business. Double show may mean anything. Six reels means twice the show that three would give.

On the Other Hand.

On the other hand, there are some good lines. There is a reference to the use of the Caravels through the co-operation of the Knights of Columbus that is impressive to the Protestant reader and invaluable with the Catholic patron and there is a reference to "telephonographical lectures" by Manager Wunderle that sounds interesting. The Selig press stuff offered such an abundance of suggestion that these should have been used. Not for the purpose of inviting invidious comparison we offer these two clippings. The first is from the Pastime poster and reads:

> The lifework of Christopher Columbus as revealed in the Selig pictures, is the greatest achievement ever offered to motion picture patrons. The interest is world wide and is destined to win millions of new friends for the photoplay.
> The glory of Columbus is greater now than ever before and the picture serves to portray the life and character of the great discoverer in a worthy manner.
> Over 350 acting people are engaged in this production. The vessels "Santa Maria," "Nina" and "Pinta" were secured by Mr. Selig with the co-operation of the Knights of Columbus; negotiations taking three years before arrangements were made.
> This scenario was written by C. E. Nixon.

This is taken from the Bijou Dream page advertisement and is picked up from the company's advertising matter.

> THE WORLD'S GREATEST MOTION PICTURE.
> The Sensation of the Film World.
> A Marvelous, Hitherto Undreamed of Achievement, which Defies Description and Baffles Imitation.
> ENDORSED BY EDUCATORS, PULPIT, PRESS, HISTORIANS AND PUBLIC.
> The One Story in History that Is Known to Everyone, Is that of Columbus and His Discovery of America.
> A RICH, COSTLY AND GORGEOUS
> pictorial visualization of indescribable magnificence. A historical film that will never be equaled—THE LIFE STORY OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS AND THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA. Told in vivid, thrilling, all absorbing dramatic reality—Inspiring in its indescribable grandeur and elegance—heart-rending in its pathetic appeal. Perfect photography, elaborate settings, correct historic detail, beautiful costumes.

Which do you think would get your ten-cent piece the quickest?

Questions of Type.

There was evidently some appeal made the teachers for there is enclosed a card which reads:

> Thursday, May 23d Open at 2 P. M.
> PUBLIC SCHOOL TEACHER
> You are cordially invited to attend
> The Pastime Theater
> 689 Knickerbocker Ave.
> Between Jefferson Avenue and Cornelia Street
> Exhibiting the three reel production,
> "The Coming of Columbus"
> A. G. WUNDERLE, Manager. Brooklyn, N. Y.

Here the entire effect is lost in the wording and the display. The type is the same sort of face that might be used to advertise a local hand laundry or the corner grocery. It wholly lacks class and appearance, though it is an appeal to the supposedly critical. The words Public School Teacher are crowded in between the date and the showing hour. It starts the card off with a jolt that is not overcome by the "cordial" invitation. Nothing is said to indicate that school teachers will be admitted free, nothing suggests that any special preparation is made for them, and if we know the Brooklyn school teachers as well as we think we do (and we really think we do) the effect of this card, cheaply printed on cheap stock will be the reverse of good. Probably not many of the cards were gotten out and it would not have cost much more for good bristol or rough surfaced stock well printed. Almost any shop has some of the Cheltenham faces, but for an invitation effect it is hard to beat some Gothic face, particularly the copperplate gothic, while the pen print gives an odd effect and there are other faces that look well in invitation form. If your printer won't stock good type faces go where you can yet well selected styles.

Getting a Laugh.

Giving a new twist to an old idea the Arcade Theater, Attica, Ind., sends in a small four page folder with the 24 point announcement on the front:

> HOW
> CROSSED
> THE > DELAWARE

The middle pages give the answer in a large face "Through the Ice" and the back page advertises the fact that the Arcade will have Washington crossing the Delaware through the ice on Decoration Day. It's a clean and snappy piece of work, but we would suggest that the effect would have been slightly better had a six point face been used for the middle page.

The joke advertisement may be overdone, but where it is used only now and them it gets a laugh and gets the business, and the Arcade idea is well done in every point.

Booming T. R.

Taking advantage of the row Col. Roosevelt is raising the Idle Hour Theater, Aberdeen, S. D., booms the Thanhouser, The Cry of the Children, with this quotation:

> "THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN" AS HEARD BY THEODORE ROOSEVELT.
> When I plead the cause of the overworked girl in a factory, of the stunted child toiling at inhuman labor, of all who work excessively long hours, or in unhealthy surroundings, of the family dwelling in the squalor of a noisome tenement; when I protest against the unfair profit of unscrupulous and conscienceless men or against the greedy exploitation of the helpless by the beneficiary of privilege, I am not only fighting for the weak, I am fighting also for the strong.

A large line cut catches the attention.

The political appeal will be all right from now until November, so long as you refrain from taking sides, but it is a good thing to keep your own politics quietly hidden. The Imp's Presidential Possibilities is probably the first of a series of political releases, all of which will be valuable if you do not let them get into an argument. Be careful of your advertising or you'll be liable to lose instead of win.

Window Cards.

Walter H. Brooks, manager of the Pastime Theater, Canton, Pa., sends a sample of a two-color window card used for special releases. Mr. Brooks notes these facts on the back of the card, subjecting it to letter postage instead of the printed rate and then puts on letter postage. We do not mind paying postage due on material sent, but when we meet up with a man who thinks of these little things as Mr. Brooks has, we extend the hand of fellowship. Carefulness in these little things argues for care in the big things and we've an idea that Mr. Brooks runs a mighty good house, a belief the window card backs up.

The wording is simple but concise, and about the only objection to be made is that the title (Cinderella is the release advertised) should have been more nearly of a size with the theater's name and the fact that it was "Coming." As it stands the latter word, in black, completely overshadows the title in red. Effective use is made of Roycroft with a simpler face in the larger sizes, and apart from the title the distribution of red and black is well balanced and intelligently done. The card is not crowded and in a window should stand out well.

Window Advertising.

The value of window card advertising depends on the manner in which it is done. If there is an excess of cards used about town the mass sinks the whole lot of them, but where they are sparingly used by others the card placed where it will be seen by the passer by will bring to the theater persons who might not otherwise know of the special attraction.

You can't put much on a window card and have it read. Get the name of your house, the name of the subject and the date large and just a line or two of argument and you'll be read, but if you load the pasteboard with everything you ever heard about the film no one will take the time to read it and no fact will stand out so prominently as to catch the eye. Fifty words that are read are worth a hundred times the two hundred words that are not read. Most of this Pastime copy is 48 point or larger and can be read (all of it) at a glance.

Some Old Friends Wanted.

Will Dean R. Daynes, of Salt Lake City, H. R. Chaney, of Hillsboro, Ohio, Melvin G. Winstock, of Portland, and some of the other old "regulars" please remember that this department does not shut down for the summer, but is always glad to hear from its assistant editors?

MORE ABOUT MARKETS.

HERE are some more market advices which should be added to those already printed. It should be noted that the Nestor report replaces the earlier advice.

NESTOR FILM CO. (Richard Willis, Editor), Hollywood, Cal. Mr. Willis writes: "Our photoplay wants frequently change. At present we are in the market for strong dramas with original motifs. We need them. Really good comedies will also receive attention." Independent.

CHAMPION FILM CO. (Editor not stated), 145 West 45th Street, New York City. Can use Western and Military dramas and melodrama. Independent.

ECLAIR FILM CO. (Eustace Hale Ball, Editor), Fort Lee, N. J., wants Eastern dramas, spirited comedy dramas, military and seacoast dramas, costume plays, society comedies, light comedies and full reel farces. Mr. Ball adds: "We desire real scenarios, the writing of which may be perfected by a study of Technique of the Photoplay. We do not want single page scenarios nor suggestions, but the neat, professional work, for which we are willing to pay well. We insist upon full postage being prepaid and require a self-addressed return envelope, though we are insulted almost daily because we require compliance with these generally established rules." Independent.

MAJESTIC MOTION PICTURE CO. (Hopp Hadley, Editor), 540 West 21st Street, New York City. Can use comedy drama, light comedy, short and full reel faces. Independent.

BISON. (Richard V. Spencer, Editor), 1712 Allesandro Street, Los Angeles, Cal. Mr. Spencer writes: "We are now in the market for straight dramatic split reel comedies in addition to the other classes numerated in a previous letter. I expect to have to supply five directors with stories, so the market is a big one, and I want all the authors to 'come in on while the water is fine.' Am promised additional help in my department, so should be able to give prompt consideration to all scrips."

That Dinner of Ours.

THE Photoplaywrights' dinner suggested by Spectator, but which he turned over to us, since "Spec" is a name and not an entity, is progressing finely. Charles L. Gaskill, whose original idea led into the greater plan, has accepted the appointment of committee and promises to make a speech if there is adequate police protection. Already many have signified their acceptance and by the time this gets into print the arrangements will have progressed to a more definite point. We hope to be able to announce time, place and price in the next issue. Meanwhile, if you can qualify as a photoplaywright and want to be at our first dinner please give notice of your intention, naming your produced plays, and offering any suggestion you may wish to make.

Getting the "Grip."

It takes a lot of nerve to proclaim failure. It's easy to trumpet success, but here are some thoughtful suggestions from a photoplaywright who admits that he has not yet sold a script. He is Alonzo Hawes Beardsley, of Cambridge, Mass., and he writes:

> With no hidden design and without a vestige of any regret I proclaim myself, to date, a very successful failure as a photoplaywright. With "Technique of the Photoplay," "The Moving Picture World" and other more or less helpful "sample scenario" literature by my side I have painstakingly endeavored to earn my "$50.00" per week. The result has been a steady procession of photoplays going and coming from nearly all the companies in the business. I have still to get one play accepted.
> Some will say this is very evidently not my field of endeavor and that the sooner I stop writing plays the more satisfied I'll be and the less work some poor editor will have. This is true enough, lookat the case superficially. But suppose that those who advise this step knew that I hold letters in my possession from editors in which my work is acknowledged to be original and ingenious but lacking the "gripping" quality essential to success. Anyone, with any "push," would be a "Quitter" to throw up his hands until he had burnt midnight oil trying to find that elusive "gripping quality." I have laid in a good supply of oil.
> Between the glittering "$50.00 a week" advertisements, the desire to see my work at the local "Opry" house and my fancied dramatic abilities I write hurriedly, carelessly and fruitlessly.
> The more I think it over and the harder I try, the more firmly am I convinced that failure at first weeds out the "quitters," proves the courage of the "stayers," and makes ready the "winners."
> In my little text-book "Technique of the Photoplay" it says in the introduction, "the writing of photoplays is at once the most simple and the most difficult form of dramatic construction, etc." Truer words were never written. This is just where most of us get left. It's so simple we think there is nothing to it and therefore many, like myself, wake up to the fact, after supporting the post office for several months, that photoplay writing is a high art and that it needs just as much care, work and courage to succeed in this as in any other line of endeavor.
> Probably no reader of this magazine is lower in the scale of photoplay writing than I am, but nevertheless what follows may not be rejected as "unavailable for present use."
> Seriously, my lack of success has spurred me on to attempt the realization of my first aspirations. It has made me take each rejection slip and letter to a mental jury who, after careful thought, returned the verdict "it's up to you, not the editor." It has made me take the greatest possible pains with my form, my typewriting, my English, my brevity and my clearness. It has made me look ahead to the infinite possibilities of this newest of arts, the tremendous opportunities for expansion along educational lines, the powerful weapon for good that it is and can continue to be and the happy form of relaxation it has become for those who labor with their hands, whose large, honest hearts exceed the size of their pocketbooks. It is up to us who are willing to fight it out "if it takes all summer" to realize the dignity of what we are trying to do, it is for us to take infinite pains, to realize it is pioneer labor, to cast aside our petty ways and to raise the photoplay to an elevation equal to any other intellectual art. Let us spend more time improving our plays and less in quarreling with overburdened editors, more time to compelling better prices by good work and less to lamentation over existing compensation and, above all, more time to being gentlemen in a dignified profession and less to trying to convince editors and producers that they are not.

If Mr. Beardsley has come to the realization that Photoplay is an art and not merely a cinch, he is at least headed in the right direction. He possesses perseverance and that means much, but he lacks the "grip," and that is where many more than he fail to gain success.

Grip is merely a synonym for dramatic value. Grip is the deft touch that raises the commonplace to the remarkable. Grip is an appeal to the heart simply but skillfully made and, last of all, grip is merely sincerity.

We saw a script the other day in which the big scene was only the reading of a curt letter. The writer knew that the situation must be conveyed by letter and so he had the hero read a letter—just that. A man brings the hero a letter, the hero reads it and looks distressed. A slight change eliminated the letter and produced instead a situation. In place of the break in the screen while the audience studied out the writing the girl came in and confronted the man. The situation was dramatic, gripping and sincere. The letter was merely an appeal to the brain. The situation was an appeal to the sight and of the two the picture is by far the more gripping than the insert.

Take the not unusual story of the man who deserts the sweetheart of his early days for the more brilliant woman of his present advanced station in life. There is a situation common enough, both in photoplay and in real life. It is possessed of its pathos; this woman who has been outgrown by her more accomplished sweetheart, but there is no particular grip to the story. The girl is deserted, and we're sorry for her, but with night schools and books on etiquette, why didn't she strive to keep pace with her recreant fiance.

But this situation can be made gripping and intense if it is played up. Suppose that these two, this man and girl, are emigrants. He has boundless ambition and brains. He wants to study for the law or the practice of medicine. She is proud of his brilliancy, eager to promote his interests. He goes to school, to college, to the Law School or the College of Medicine. All the time she slaves day and night for the pittance that will keep her alive. The rest of her earnings go to him. He must dress well, live well, keep up appearance; so she works for this wonderful sweetheart of hers who some day will be a great surgeon. She will be so proud of her famous husband.

But with education and refinement comes a distaste for this woman, still the crude emigrant girl. She has not advanced with him, she had had no opportunity for advancement. She will hamper him in the practice of his profession, she will be laughed at by his new friends. She comes to the graduation, and as the exercises are over she hurries forward to congratulate him; to be the first to wish him well. She finds him already surrounded by his fashionable friends. He is speaking to the woman he purposes to marry, who can still further advance his career. He makes an apology for this uncouth creature who rudely thrusts her way into the polite circle. His friends laugh at the odd looking girl. In a flash she senses the situation. She makes the final, the greatest sacrifice. Instead of denouncing him she accepts his patronizing contempt as no less than her due. She lets it be inferred that she is some family servant, over eager to congratulate the young master. She steals back to the loathsome tenement room to take up her broken life. Her sacrifice is complete. She has laid her all upon the altar of a faithless love.

Suppose that instead of showing all this we had merely shown the young graduate receiving a letter in which the girl writes she will not come to the exercises because she realizes that she will but hold him back in his career. Will that have the same grip? Will it make precisely the same appeal?

That's what grip means: getting the right idea and interpreting it in the proper fashion—through intelligent and carefully planned action that will most forcefully present the contrast to the eye as well as to the brain.

Merwin Goes Abroad.

Bannister Merwin, the Edison star photoplaywright, has taken a cottage on the Thames for the season and sailed June 1 for the other side. He will continue to contribute to the Edison releases and it would not be surprising if he wrote some stories of English life to coax a field company over the water. Those familiar with the beautiful English country cannot but hope that this will come to pass. The southern counties are one vast park, while the Highlands of Scotland will provide marked contrast of scene. The summer trip is not planned for the purpose of writing English scripts, but these should follow. With Kalem and Vitagraph already in the field, the Edison exodus would not be surprising.

Hadley for Majestic.

Hoff Hadley is the new photoplay editor for the Majestic Company. T. Hays Hunter has gone to the same company to specialize in comedy, a branch in which the Majestic has shown strength in the past.

The Extended Script.

William H. Kitchell seems to be the only writer to date who realizes that the Bannister Merwin editorial recently published is the first plea for the fully developed script. He writes:

> Bannister Merwin hits the nail on the hammer end when he pleads for the full script photoplay. If there are not qualified writers it is the fault of the $15 check system. If there are give them a chance to deliver the goods. There are times when it is necessary for the director to hash a script to fit the conditions of his particular studio, but as a rule this is not necessary. The photoplaywright who does not see at least four reels a day, six days a week, is in the minority, while the producer who sees the product of any studio other than his own is the exception. Which is the better able to judge the effect of business on his audiences?
> A 250 word synopsis and the three page plot of action is not a photoplay: it is a handbill, advertising nothing. If a writer is doing good work let him do it in his own way, provided that she has any system whatever. There are twelve studios operating today whose live and artistic treatment of the photoplay is keeping up the reputation of the product generally. The output of the others lacks variety. New plots occasionally—perhaps—but only one director and his monotonous handling of varied themes with the same treatment. There is too much revision of "outside stuff" to suit the fancied needs of the studio and too little revision of the studio product.

Perhaps, at the photoplaywriters' dinner we can induce Mr. Kitchell to name those twelve studios, but there is sound sense in what he says. Too many studios have become "rutted" and run along handling all themes in the fashion that they fancy brings them success. There is no variety to the output. The indifferent script is "built up" and the real story "built down" until the same level of mediocrity or somewhat better is attained.

Things cannot be otherwise so long as the "three page" script is demanded, though we quarrel with Mr. Kitchell on the 250 word synopsis. That has been keeping him awake nights longer than it should have and he declines to regard it merely as the chapter heading of his plot, but he writes much more than the three page script, and when his action is followed, good results have been shown. Where the merest skeleton of plot is permitted, the details being filled in by the producer, the play naturally becomes the work of the producer rather than the author, and where the author really knows how to plan his action intelligently and effectively, he should be given a free hand and his script followed as closely as possible.

If directors were beyond criticism their position would be impregnable, but we never knew a man yet who knew it all, and the best director is the man who, as Mr. Merwin puts it, interprets the ideas of various authors with sympathy and skill.

Did Better Himself.

C. F. Ingraham, of Clinton, Iowa, doesn't seem to think as much of some photoplay experts as he did, and possibly others will gain wisdom from him rather than from sad experience. Mr. Ingraham writes:

> The little article entitled "Oh, Shush" in your issue of May 11 was all right. I wish I had read it six months ago. I had a few plays "revised, corrected and criticised" by "an expert" with the result that they "came back" a good deal quicker than when I trusted to my own ideas. I tore them up and rewrote them with better results than I had by sending them out as "corrected."
> The spelling of the party who typed these plays was something awful to see, and I was at additional expense to have them re-typed before sending them out. For instance, "ankle" was spelled a-n-c-k-l-e, and "wry," (she makes a wry face) was written "rye," although I had no reference to grain or booze in the whole play.
> My best scenes were cut out and weaker ones substituted, as the suggestions of the editors will show. I have received many good tips from editors, and have found them all courteous and helpful.

Explanations.

The paragraph in question argued that the self-styled experts would be all right if they knew their business, but suggested that most of them were lacking in real qualifications of knowledge and experience.

Letters and Action.

Old-time novelists used to be fond of the phrase "let us draw a curtain over the harrowing scene." That might have been all right in a novel, but in several scripts that we have seen lately the main point of the story is told in a letter instead of action, greatly to the detriment of the story as a whole.

The other day a man who publishes several popular priced magazines explained in a private conversation that he was losing circulation because the picture theaters showed stories while he had to tell them; that the pictured action was more gripping than typed recital, and that he could not hope to compete.

In nine cases out of ten the action of a photoplay can be changed so that the important action is shown instead of conveyed by a letter, and where this is done the effect is far more striking. When Beulah, the charming but hasty tempered heroine, tells her Charles that he must choose between her and his invalid sister it looks far more important than when she merely sits down and writes him a note that all is over between them because he is faithful to his trust. A letter is cold and without emphasis, but suppose that Charles had promised to take Beulah to a ball and writes that he cannot come because little sister is not feeling well. Beulah, radiant in her gladdest rags, goes to his house and breaks into the sick chamber, demanding that Charles make his choice. There is a splendid opening for some big acting by Charles, his sister and Beulah. Isn't that better than a formal letter? Very well. Plan your story so that the players get their chance to the improvement of your story. Just say "Charles Makes His Choice" and write a scene instead of a letter. Much better.

INQUIRIES

NOTE—No questions can be answered by mail. A list of studio addresses will be sent for a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

RAYMOND T.—A letter addressed the Selig Company at Chicago, will reach, but the street address is 20 East Randolph Street.

C. E. C.—You're getting us mixed up with another paper that likes to talk about scenarios on the flaps of envelopes. While three or four companies will buy an idea in synopsis form, most editors demand a photoplay and not a ten-line suggestion. You are paid for what you have to offer and the companies which do purchase "the bare idea" pay only for that—usually five to fifteen dollars at the highest.

E. H. H.—Tut! Tut! We did not say that Maurice Costello got married "in self defense," nothing like it. We said we thought he announced he was married as a defense against empty headed little girls who write silly love letters. And most decidedly, positively and emphatically, "all the Vitagraph children" are not his. His little daughters, Helen and Dolores, sometimes appear in the pictures, but there are other kiddies who do not bear the name of Costello in pictures or out.

RICHARD ROE.—The statement recently made that "Harold Shaw was Tom Pinch in Edison's Martin Chuzzlewit," has nothing whatever to do with the fact that the story was not released at the time the statement was published. We have had the cast since the early part of January. If you are quibbling over the statement that Harold Shaw was Tom Pinch, it is explained that the past tense was employed because the picture was already made—in November.

G. C.—That Edison release is seventeen months old, but Richard Niel was the Jimmie in "The Test of Friendship."

PHILADELPHIA READER.—We know of no book of instruction on producing motion pictures. Mr. Richardson's Handbook is the standard work on all matters of projection. It may be had of our publishers at $1.50 a copy, postpaid. Motion picture photography, like the direction of photoplays, is to be learned only through experience. The bad appearance of the end of some films is generally due to the practice of letting the end run through the camera and whip around in the take-up box until the machine is stopped.

J. L. W.—We do not, as a rule, reply to questions of relationship, but the two men you mention are not related. Owen Moore is with the new Victor Company and there seems to be no likelihood of his going to the Biograph. Mr. Lanning was playing vaudeville dates a few weeks ago.

C. L. D.—Just how much you can take from a copyrighted work without infringing is a matter of nice judgment. The "single thought" you mention might be the basis of the whole novel. Why not think up your own ideas, and not flirt with copyright? At the same time it is not against either law or morality to obtain a suggestion from the work of another.

J. M. C.—To answer Biograph questions would entail more trouble than the results would be worth, so we answer only those to which the answers come to hand. The "Little Blonde," as she generally is called, is Miss Sweet. We think her first name is Olga. In England you can get post-cards of the Biograph players in sixpenny boxes of candy, but it is different over here for some reason.

T. C.—In Thanhouser's "Jess" Miss Marguerite Show was Jess, and Miss Flo. LaBadie, Bess.

B. D.—If you had had our experience with Philadelphia fans you would be suspicious of every letter that came from Lubinville. Glad to know you are not one of the suspects.

F. H.—We are afraid that your chances for obtaining the representation of an American film company in Germany are rather poor. Most companies have foreign agents or branches and there is no opening that we know of. Still, you might query the companies. It would do no harm and you can offer your experience.

EARNEST INQUIRER.—As a rule in writing a two reel script you make a definite break between the two parts, winding up the first with a minor climax, as is generally done at the end of each chapter in a novel. The Bison Company, however, seems to want a continuous script, preferring to make the division itself.

R. H. M.—Your letter seems to place some photoplayers in the same class with the glib little ushers who kill the leading players several times a week and keep us busy picking crape off sobby letters. The Vitagraph has for sale the photographs of Miss Schaffer and other players, and does not regard with contempt that Western section, which has turned out some remarkably good work. The person who makes a statement to the contrary is the reverse of George Washington, and the gloves are yours. Robert Thornby played the part you mention.

B. G.—If you will turn to the Inquiry Department for May 25th, you will find that we have listed both Miss Pickford and Miss Sweet as present members of the Biograph Company. By looking above (J. M. C.), you will see that Miss Sweet is the "Little Blonde."

M. V. B.—Miss Vivian Prescott was the feminine lead in Imp's "Tempted But True." Edna Foster was the child in the Reliance's "The District Attorney's Conscience," as we have stated before.

MRS. M. N. G.—We do not place the film "Life in Joliet Prison," (it cannot be Joliet Prison in Chicago, as you have it, for Joliet is some distance from Chicago). Perhaps some reader will recall the film.

C. E. S.—"The man that used to play with King Baggot so much," is rather a vague description, but we have an idea that you have reference to Owen Moore, now playing with Miss Florence Lawrence in the new Victor Company.

K. W. C.—The Powers Company does not keep a record of its casts and the Rex press agent doesn't take the trouble to answer questions.

RICHARD ROE.—Pathe does not reply to our inquiries. Miss May Buckley was the bride in Lubin's "The Honeymooners." The other inquiry seems to refer to Peter Lang.

A. J.—William Clifford was the young man in Melies' "All is Fair." Miss Gertrude Robinson most assuredly did play for Biograph. Better write the Fox Company again. They have shut down temporarily. We note that you always read this department, and yet you ask about Miss Robinson in the face of the recent argument as to whether she did or did not play "Pippa Passes." Read more closely. The suggestion you make is a good one and would be practical if some of the companies had press agents instead of trance mediums.

J. A. M.—Your Solax questions have not been replied to yet. The servant in "Tables Turned" was not cast by the company. Jack Brammell and Gaston Bell were the soldier and the rival in Majestic's "A Warrior Bold." Charles Herman was the father in Reliance's "A Question of Evidence." You'll have to dig up that Eclair title. The girl who won in the end in Lubin's "His Mistake," was Miss Ormi Hawley.

VITAGRAPH DATES CHANGE.

"The Transition" or "Alixe," announced by the Vitagraph Company for release on Tuesday, June 25th, has been replaced for that date by a split reel containing "Never Again," an excellent comedy, and "The Carpathia," the famous Titanic rescue ship.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"ON EL MONTE RANCH" (Essanay), June 4.—There is in this film some good scenery and some good riding—of the pursuit sort. The pursuit feature is noteworthy in that it is intelligently directed—the two parties to the scene breaking cover in each new picture at a uniform distance. The reel concludes with a most pronounced soul kiss by Anderson.

"DREAM OF A MOVING PICTURE DIRECTOR" (Lubin), June 5.—Interesting chiefly as a demonstration of the construction of a moving picture. The comedy shows the director's demand for scenario, his summoning of the actors and actresses and reading to them the story and their subsequent retirement to their dressing rooms to "fuss up." While the property men are arranging the "stage" the director falls asleep. He dreams a very troubled dream. When a row of buildings falls on him he wakes up.

"MOCKERY" (Vitagraph), June 5.—Of this film there is but one thing to be said—Marshall P. Wilder. This is not the place to attempt to do justice to this remarkable and artistic triumph of a Vitagraph star. The comedian has turned tragedian, and his work shows that his grasp of the requirements of the one is as firm as is that of the other. Ralph Ince is also in the picture. His work is especially worthy of mention. As the grinning features of Wilder faded behind the parted curtains in the final scene of "Mockery," a Broadway morning audience in awed fashion looked around from one to another. It was the silent tribute to a rare film.

"IN DAYS OF OLD" (Eclipse), June 5.—A picture containing superb views of old castles and charming landscape. It is a story of a maiden carried off by a "robber baron" and held for ransom, and her subsequent rescue by her guardian and his allies.

"THE SHADOW ON THE BLIND" (Edison), June 8.—A comedy with an idea that is quite fresh and pleasing. The picture has also a bit of not very effective farce business in which a self-willed father attempts to force his son to marry, off-hand, a girl who seemed entirely willing. The young people had never met before. The father knew just as little of her; for they fooled him by dressing up the young man's sweetheart as the heiress and the ceremony was performed, the father thinking that his son was making the desired match; and the young people are much elated because they were fooling father. The shadow on the blind was a charcoal silhouette made by the sweetheart's father, an artist. It was visible from the lover's home during the marriage and helped to fool the scheming father. It is delightfully acted and produced. The scenario is by Harry Furniss and he plays the role of the artist. Miss McCoy plays the girl.

"A CHILD OF THE PURPLE SAGE" (Essanay), June 8.—A Broncho Billy picture in which the bad man is again converted, this time by the "Child of the purple sage." Broncho had once loved her mother, but despite all his promises, he would drink. She gave him back his ring and married another. Years pass; a widow, she is bringing her little girl back to her people in a prairie schooner when she, too, dies. Broncho finds the little girl, alone in the desert with the dead mother. He is astonished to discover who the woman is, or was, and takes the orphan under his wing. It is a well handled, clear picture and gets over into our sympathies, although it is not so strong as the preceding Broncho Billy picture. It is well photographed.

"SCENES IN THE TURKISH-ITALIAN WAR" (Cines), June 8.—This clearly photographed series of views is a valuable addition to the week's list of releases. It gives a very illuminating idea of modern warfare. Modern warfare is not wildly exciting. There is more hard work to it than excitement; but although the enemy is hidden, we see in these pictures the movements of the troops and see the big guns in action. From a distance we see the shells bursting where the enemy lies. It's a very good picture.

"A WINDY DAY" (Lubin), June 10.—A farce with a clown's part as its chief point of interest. The best of it is due to trick photography and there is a good deal of rather rudimentary fun in it. It brought out a good deal of boisterous laughter. It is photographed very well.

"LULU'S DOCTOR" (Vitagraph), June 10.—A pleasant little picture that doesn't pretend to any special freshness, but one that has an exquisite scene in which little Helen Costello, as Lulu, a little orphan, helps Aunty Madge (Clara Kimball Young) at washing dishes. Aunty and her fiance, the doctor (Maurice Costello) had had a quarrel. The little girl Lulu calls at his office, not knowing who he is, to have him doctor a broken doll. This is the beginning of a happy ending. The photography is excellent.

"THE DRUMMER GIRL OF VICKSBURG" (Kalem), June 5.—In this picture there is given a representation of a battery of four Parrot guns in action. There is also a stirring hitching up of one gun and removal to another part of the field. A double love story runs through the picture.

"THE ENCHANTED FIFER" (C. G. P. C.), June 7.—A hand-colored film, announced as for juveniles. It will also interest grown-ups as well. It is in Pathe's best style—gorgeous costumes and regal pageantry, and a story of a stern father, lovelorn princess and a suing fifer, who, through the aid of a good fairy, turns the tables on the king and compels him to yield.

"THE IRBITH (SIBERIA) FAIR" (C. G. P. C.), June 7.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this picture of a winter fair. It has plenty of the "atmosphere" suited for warm weather. There are scenes of the horse market, of the hide mart and of the fish and meat market, where no artificial refrigeration is necessary. Milk in Irbith is sold in solidly frozen blocks.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 24.—The first scene is of the tryout at Frohnau, Germany, of Olympic games contestants. Also there are pictures of the military field mass at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, of the destruction by fire of Sea Gate, near Portland, Ore.; the start of the balloon race at St. Cloud, France, in which twenty of the gas bags were entered—a great picture; the Memorial Day parade in New York City, the use of dynamite in Rehoboth, Del., in an effort to uncover some of Capt. Kidd's much-sought treasure; the trip of the Turkish Sultan through Constantinople to open Parliament, the review by Mayor Shank of Indianapolis of his city's civic parade, the interstate tennis match at Adelaide, Australia; Colonel Roosevelt's winding up of his primary campaign in New Jersey, an interesting picture of U. S. Grant Post, Grand Army, at the tomb of General Grant, and two colored pictures for the women—one of head dress and the other of summer millinery—direct from Paris.

"THE PUGILIST AND THE GIRL" (Kalem), June 7.—Miss Ruth Roland leads in this romantic comedy as "the girl." She makes her sweetheart jealous. He is a good amateur sparring artist, and the man he is up against is, although this is not known, the champion middle-weight of the Northwest. The sweetheart conspires to get him into the ring and succeeds, but in the mill the confident sweetheart gets a fearful drubbing and it is all in sight of the girl. Yet, when she finds who the opponent was, she is proud of the showing that the young man made and makes up with him. Miss Roland's abilities in comedy are well known; she alone pulls this picture out of its encumbering obscurity by her amusing facial expression which is as clear as conversation. The picture has too many characters whose place in it is obscure. There are a couple of good sparring contests in it.

"A HUSBAND'S AWAKENING" (Lubin), June 6.—Arthur Johnson takes the center of the stage in a good comedy, set amid the luxurious interiors—and exteriors—which always seem to be at his command in the pictures he directs. The theme is the old one of not a bad marriage, merely a hasty one; just a matter of pleasing mother, in order to get the wherewithal to liquidate a few pressing bets, or, more elegantly, but not less truthfully, many pressing debts. The wife is in love with Artie, all right; but when, after three months of marriage, she finds her husband paying real fond attention to a real widow—not one of your fair, fat and forty sort either—her sobs are of very short duration. She gets on the job. She soon has all the boys eating out of her hand. Artie wakes up; he realizes there is something or somebody on earth besides widows—among others his wife. Likewise he also gets on the job, and after several bad quarters of an hour he is permitted to know that his wife still loves him.

"VERY MUCH ENGAGED" (Edison), June 5.—Some Broadway habitues laughed at this comedy, which is of the exaggerated rube sort. A youngster from up or down somewhere comes to the city to see the sights. He gets a bargain in diamond rings at 10 cents each, and on his return to bucolic surroundings proceeds to entangle himself with five or six of the leading lights of the younger social set through gifts of his "rings." As a means of escaping suits for breach of promise he secures a clergyman to marry him to one of the girls who has not sued him. The knot is tied in the presence of but one witness.

"THE LEGACY OF HAPPINESS" (Essanay), June 6.—A conventional drama showing how much better off the young man is, poor and happy, with the girl of his choice as compared to the rich young man who is "bagged" through the machinations of touting brothers and scheming mammas, aided and abetted by a heartless and avaricious girl, the whole blessed family living in a home of deceit. The picture is well staged, but is marred by careless editing of scenario. The discontented lover receives a note from his sweetheart in which he is addressed as Arthur; a moment later his lawyer, James Wilson, addresses him as Allen. Lawyer James Wilson introduces the young man, now dreaming he is rich, to John Wilson, a touting brother. When the aforesaid young man realizes he is in the wrong pew he asks his lawyer, James, to send him a fake telegram while the young man is a guest at the home of John. The telegram comes from his lawyer, telling of a fortune lost through speculation. The message is signed John Wilson.

"THE MAN WHO MADE GOOD" (Edison), June 7.—Arthur Stringer has written a good newspaper story. The chief characters are taken by Bigelow Cooper as the city editor, and he gets from the part all there is in it; Harold M. West, as a young reporter out of a job, and George Lessey as a notorious thief. The unfolding of the story will hold the close attention of an audience, and it may be well to note that this is accomplished in spite of the fact that there is not a woman in the cast.

"BILLY CHANGES HIS MIND" (Essanay), June 7.—William McGrath rescues Ethel Woodby's poodle from a vicious bulldog; he does more than that. He sends Ethel home in his machine and hands her his card. When mamma sees the cardboard she hies for the Elite Directory. Billy looks good to her. Daughter accordingly sends photo, about 12 x 16, of herself to Billy as a reminder he is to call. Billy gets away from home all right with one exception. In his eagerness he forgets to put on his waistcoat, the omission of which he does not discover until he has been in some mysterious manner safely seated in Ethel's home. Then he tries to hide preliminary to breaking out. He gets no opportunity, but he does hear the family put through a dress rehearsal in order the more surely to corral him. Billy is funny, as he seems always to be, and rarely more so than when he is compelled to beat up father that he may escape. Ethel also contributes her share.

"HOME FOLKS" (Biograph), June 6.—Into this simple pastoral, Biograph has put its best. It is a plain tale of plain people. The adornment is in the acting—chiefly of father and daughter, although mother and son do the full share that the lines lay upon them. The father is of the stern, Puritanical type; whiskers, no mustache, long coat; his Bible is always by him. Every small community has at least one of him, and every small community will immediately recognize the very man in the mind of the writer of the scenario. The father forbids the son and daughter going to the barn dance. The son disobeys. Castigated, verbally and physically, beyond endurance, the son puts in a couple of stiff ones to the paternal jaw. It is hard to repress "Hit him again!" The son is thrown out. The sister gathers her savings and lets herself out of her window to get the small sum to her brother. It is a pretty illustration of a sister's devotion. The father warns the family the son's name is not again to be spoken. The portrayal of the cowed and shrinking mother and daughter is notable. Well, the son gone, the family moves to new fields. The blacksmith comes to board with them. He falls in love with Mary; she, strangely enough, also with him. The son writes home; the father refuses to listen to the letter. Mary and the blacksmith are married, and the latter goes to town. The son comes home. The husband, returning earlier than expected, sees Mary and her brother embracing. Mary and her mother take the son into the room where the father sits asleep. When he awakes he orders out the son. Mary calls his attention to the fact that in his hand there is the collar and tie he tore from the neck of his boy when he threw him out. The father takes his son in his arms. About this time the blacksmith, unable longer to stand the pressure, breaks into the room. Abashed, he drags Mary into the next room to put on her shoulders the new coat he had brought her; he failed, however, to recover in time the note he had left in the coat telling of his intended departure. There are some tense moments in the telling of this gripping story.

"THE CYLINDER'S SECRET" (Vitagraph), June 7.—Airy, fairy Lillian has for the time turned her shoulder on comedy and taken a hand in tragedy—an interesting story revealing the possibilities of the phonograph as an agent for the fastening of crime on the guilty and, what is more important, for freeing the innocent. The picture is well worth seeing.

"THE TEXAN TWINS" (Pathe), June 5.—Mr. Crane Wilbur plays a double role in this picture as the twins. The camera work that makes this possible has been well done and one notices no awkwardness that gives away the secret by making it seem unnatural. It is partly a love story, yet has little heart interest, it being an extremely clever farce comedy in which there is much rough realism that almost becomes brutality. It has many loud laughs and a large audience responded boisterously to it. It is a ranch, cowboy story, very new as to filling in, but old in outline. It is acted with vim, regardless of the comfort of the players. It seemed to please the spectators highly.

"MISTAKEN IDENTITY" (Selig), June 7.—A brand new idea is presented in this picture; but it isn't one that would be probable in real life. It is a short picture and there are two real laughs at the end to which the audience as a whole responded heartily. It is a well constructed short farce comedy and makes good entertainment.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS" (Selig), June 7.—On the same reel is this addition to the well-known series. It seems better than the others, has more point. There are new characters introduced and many kids in it, and only three of them get licked. The audience found it amusing.

"MAKING GOOD" (Melies), June 6.—As entertainment, this picture distinctly makes good. It is a love story of a youth who, at first, is drinking far too much. His father tells him to shift for himself until he can make good. The larger part of the story is set among the oil wells in California, where he gets his job. Many very interesting glimpses of the queer oil pumping machinery find place in the story as naturally convincing backgrounds. The dainty heroine, daughter of the foreman, is the well-known Melies leading lady, and fills these romantic parts more than acceptably well. The picture, a first-class romantic melodrama, will be liked. The camera work is good.

"THE TRIFLER" (Cines), June 4.—A picture that interests and pleases. It is slight. It is good entertainment, because it is well acted by intelligent, pleasing players, and it has some fine scenes. The plot cannot be called strong; for its freshness seems to be at the expense of convincing power, and it lacks that positive assurance of human truth that is marked in the very best pictures. The photographs are very good.

"PICTURESQUE PADUA" (Cines), June 4.—It is fairly interesting, but very short.

"THE LURE OF THE FOOTLIGHTS" (Pathe), June 6.—A well-made picture with a very convincing picture of a theater on fire as a climax setting. This is very good, indeed, astonishingly so. The acting has the worthy qualities that Paul Panzer and Octavia Handworth, who play the leads, usually show. It is, in fact, a very praiseworthy melodrama, in which the husband who sacrifices all his comforts to give his wife, with "a superb voice" the best musical education, only to be forgotten by her in the hour of her success and fame. The husband rescues her from the burning theater and both are happy again. It is well photographed.

"MAKING PHOTOPLAYS IN EGYPT" (Kalem), June 10.—It was a good idea to make such a picture as this, and Sidney Olcott, who produced it, has scored one more very emphatic success. It is full of news interest, and also of the interest that human nature always gives. It is a picture of how Sid Olcott put over in an Arab village a story by Gene Gauntier. First we see Miss Gauntier finishing the manuscript, then we see Olcott reading it to the company. Next, he takes his Arab interpreter and goes out in the desert to a village of natives to choose the backgrounds. We are shown glimpses of the village life while he is talking with the sheik. Next day he brings out the company and his real troubles begin. He has to use a horde of lesser figures who can't understand English. One scene reminded us of the plight of an umpire, brought by the village baseball nine to an unfriendly town, when the game is close. It is likely to be a very popular picture. It held a large audience and deserves high praise. The photography is as usual in these pictures by the Kalem people.

"A TEMPORARY TRUCE" (Biograph), June 10.—Fifteen hundred feet of Western stuff, and every foot is good. If it is different from—and superior to—the common ordinary Wild and Woolly, it is because there is a real plot. In addition to this and fortifying this there is in the interpretation and execution of the plot real class. In spite of the fact that tragedy is the predominating note of the reel and a half, there were several points where an adult Fourteenth Street audience found occasion for hearty laughter. The scenery made a fitting setting for the drama. There is the frontier town with its single street; and there are mountains and valleys the view of which lift the confined city dweller out of his brick and concrete environment.

"THE PRICE OF ART" (Selig), June 10.—A drama, with a climax of realism unusual in so far that a full-length drawing of a character in the play is cut to pieces. Instead of the timeworn subterfuge of showing the back of a drawing, the audience is permitted to see that this is a lifelike representation. The photography is good and the piece holds up well.

"THE MIS-SENT LETTER" (Essanay), June 11.—Good comedy all the way. The whole story hinges on the efforts of a husband to keep from his wife knowledge of an act which was perfectly proper for him to perform—i. e., the "staking" of an actress, a niece. The title indicates the origin of the initial mix-up, and troubles multiply fast. The working out of the story would seem to indicate that the uneasiness of the wife regarding her husband's gayety was more or less justified.

"PANDORA'S BOX" (Vitagraph), June 11.—Lillian Walker does a stunt as a slatternly maid; she does it well. Assisting her are John Bunny, William Shea, Flora Finch and Kate Price—a combination hard to beat. Pandora's curiosity is the cause of all the trouble, but the victimized lovers get square in the end when a trap is laid for the maid, or rather several traps compressed into one, as Pandora discovers when she opens the lost box. There are mice a-plenty; Pandora fades away. Typical Vitagraph comedy; that's enough.

"A STERN DESTINY" (Pathe), June 8.—A tale of an escaped convict taking along in his flight a child whose abuse he has witnessed. The felon becomes Mayor of a town in the course of ten years; his ward is grown to young womanhood. On the morning of his election his published photograph attracts the attention of his old cellmate, who immediately levies blackmail. Returning for more money, he sees the ward and declares that if the Mayor will give him her hand he will "call it square." The Mayor pretends to consent, but instead hastens the marriage of his ward. The ex-convict, on learning of the marriage, denounces the Mayor. The Mayor dies the following morning. Pathe has done good work in this drama.

"TEN DAYS WITH A FLEET OF U. S. BATTLESHIPS" (Edison), June 11.—A picture to which an audience gave the closest attention. It is a release that can hardly fail to be popular. Nearly every one of these views was chosen to be instructive. Theatrical views, of which we see so many, the firing of guns, etc., are not found. This reel contents itself with the work-a-day and ordinary Sunday life aboard the ships of Uncle Sam. Drilling, scrubbing of clothes, the hoisting of the large, row-boats or the steam launch over the ship's side; the "mast" or daily court for the examining and punishment of the ship's petty delinquents (this a very interesting item). There are several general views, such as of one big ship joining the fleet, the departure of a rear-admiral from a ship, etc. It is surely a fine offering.

Independent.

"THE GAMBLER" (Lux), June 21.—A Western story, by the American company, with bar-room and dance hall scenes, some beautiful, natural back grounds and thrilling action. The gambler (played by Geo. Gibbert) is a "character." Dressed in fashionable clothes, his presence in the tough beer saloon marks him out as a dominating personality—also differentiates him. The plot, which is well handled, follows a recognized melodramatic formula. We now have the strong gambler falling in love with a good girl and deciding to reform. The villain of the picture abducts this girl. A girl of the dance hall, who passionately loves the gambler, warns him of it and he, with the cowboys, rides hard to the rescue. We think it a very fair picture, entertaining and well photographed.

"A SOLDIER'S HONOR" (Bison—101), June 15.—The usual bigness of the Bison—101 pictures will be found in this two-reel feature picture of the early West. The story deals with the tragic situation of the Red men who resent being pushed off the map by white settlers. It is set in a wild, desert mountain region. There is a hot battle between the Reds and the settlers and the United States cavalry comes to the rescue. In the battle, a young lieutenant, it being his first engagement, loses his nerve and runs away. He crawls back to the post in time to see his own funeral, for they think him dead. His young wife finds out the truth from his own lips. The young lieutenant soon has a chance to prove that he is not a coward and his courageous action brings the picture, with dramatic sweep and rush, over a thrilling climax. There is a sad, but beautiful final scene. It is a very satisfying picture, substantial, human and thrilling. It is well photographed.

"FANCHON THE CRICKET" (Imp), June 17.—A love story picture of times long ago, perhaps of the middle ages. The characters are unusual and the picture has an atmosphere that reminds one of a fairy story, because the action is so different from that showing ordinary, work-a-day life. It is somewhat complicated and not easy to understand; but it is so fresh and graceful that in its lovely scenes, its dances, its strange costumes, it makes excellent entertainment. The photographs are very good. It would have been strengthened if the two lovers had been more unmistakably marked out in their own stations in life; we could have seen sooner how the two sides of the story were weaving.

"BULL FIGHT IN NUEVO, LAREDO, TEXAS" (Imp), June 15.—Surely, a bull fight is not an inspiring spectacle. There is no heart interest even in a picture of it; but there is thrill and not a little news interest, at least in sections where are no amusements of this nature permitted. No casualties, except among the bulls, are shown in this picture. It is a series of very good views of a bull fight, well photographed and acceptable.

"HOW SHORTY WON OUT" (Imp), June 15.—On the same reel we find this farce comedy in which the leads are played by Mr. Cumpson and Miss Vivian Prescott. It is a college story taken mostly on the grounds of the C. C. N. Y., which gives ideal backgrounds. The picture's idea is very fresh and good. The girl accepted invitations of seven juniors to go to the Junior Ball, and accepted "Shorty's" invitation to stay away from the ball and go to a show. The seven get into a fight and are arrested. Shorty and the girl have a pleasant evening. It is well photographed.

"WAS HE A SUFFRAGETTE?" (Republic), June 11.—A farce comedy with plenty of good amusement. It includes many fine glimpses of the recent votes for women parade. The spectators on the sidewalks, who must have seen this picture being acted, must have enjoyed seeing poor Mr. Green who was taken by the ear and forced to parade. It is very funny, and makes an excellent picture for a warm evening or afternoon. We think that the spectators will enjoy it. The camera work in very fair.

"ITALIAN FRIENDSHIP" (Powers), June 15.—A picture of Italian laborers in America. It is full of heart interest and good feeling. It is also full of very clever and very pleasing little things. The plot is simple. The whole conduct of it shows understanding and sympathy. It will be very acceptable as a relief from the very artificial, thrilling kind of picture. The camera work and acting also are very good.

"A DAY AT THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS, N. Y." (Reliance), June 12.—This is one of the most interesting pictures of wild creatures in captivity that we have seen. The Bronx Park collection is an extraordinary one, and these views of it were very wisely chosen. We understand that it took two whole days to get one series of views of a glorious snowy-white peacock. The result is worth while. It is better than the ordinary.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 13" (M. P. Dist. & Sales Co.), June 5.—There are eight interesting, wholly American items in this week's animated topical, and one glorious view, taken at Kiel, of the fleet of German battleships on its way to make a courtesy visit to Uncle Sam. These views of the great sea fighters under full steam are very well worth seeing. We also have a good view of Cardinal Farley at the dedication of the Church of St. Dennis at Yonkers, N. Y. A view of old G. A. R. men parading in West Virginia, and a series of views of the Memorial Day parade in New York City are given as are an excellent series of views of Capt. Rostron, of the Carpathia, who, with his crew, are being rewarded for the rescue of the Titanic passengers. The burial of Wilbur Wright is shown. We also are given a glimpse of Dr. Ben Reitman, the anarchist. Some good pictures of the University of Chicago Field Day are included and a few views of a big picnic at Williamsport. One series of views, taken in England, shows a lively steeplechase.

"TIT FOR TAT" (Eclair), June 9.—A comedy by the French company, giving us the mirth-making experiences of two grenadiers who, all smiles, thought they were going to get a good dinner and then, all sorrowful, thought they weren't. They get it, however, by an amusing trick, and then the master of the house got a good laugh at their expense. It is very pleasing, full of smiles, and good nature. The players are first-class comedians. The scenes are excellent. The photographs are, in some scenes, fine, and fair throughout.

"PORTUGUESE ARMY" (Eclair), June 9.—On the same reel is this series of views of the army of the new republic. The infantry is not very formidable looking, but the cavalry seems to be in better shape. These latter views are the popular feature of the picture; they show some good riding. The photography is very fair.

"THE SHRINERS PARADE AT LOS ANGELES" (Imp), June 8.—The Shriners paraded some fine floats; the pictures of them are worth seeing. They were commendably photographed. Truly, it must have been a marvelous parade. They know how to do this sort of thing in Southern California.

"PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES" (Imp), June 8.—The Imp company has a pretty good offering here. It includes excellent portraits of such men as Underwood, Blankhead, Martine, Champ Clark, Kern, Gaynor, Wilson, Harmon, La Follette, Roosevelt and Taft. It ends with a view of Taft and Teddy, both talking, apparently, to the same crowd at the same moment. This is simply a "scream;" it is likely to make an audience howl with laughter. The camera work is good throughout.

"NOTHING SHALL BE HIDDEN" (Imp), June 10.—A new device by which one can see as well as hear through the telephone has been invented by the hero of this story. The heroine is in love with him, but her father objects, laughing to scorn the young inventor's claims. But burglars break into this man's house and the inventor's device is brought, by chance, into circuit with the room where they are working at the safe. This gives the inventor, who sees them, a chance to make good. It is well made, clearly drawn and well photographed. It is not a powerful picture, but interesting and likely to be popular. Messrs. Sackville and Pollard and Misses Fisher and Crolius play it.

"A WESTERN TRIANGLE" (Republic), June 8.—A well acted Western love story in which two brothers are rivals. The successful one is accused unjustly of killing the other. But the cupidity of the villain who did the stabbing leaves him open to conviction, which comes just in time to save the younger brother from being lynched. It is like other melodramas of its kind in nearly all its qualities, except that it is acted better than the usual picture.

"BEAUTIFUL PALO DURO" (Republic), June 8.—On the same reel are these views of a wild valley in Texas, which they have proposed making into a national park. These pictures are queer and very interesting. It must be a strange place.

"THOSE WERE THE HAPPY DAYS" (Powers), June 12.—They were childhood's days and schooldays in a country village. The comedy situation is made by two little tots who want to get out of school. They make the teacher think they have smallpox. The characters are burlesqued just enough to be amusing. As light, summer comedy, it is first class.

"GOING UP?" (Powers), June 12.—On the same reel is this short and rather artificial farce. It has, however, some quality and will be liked. The camera work of both is very fair.

"HATS AND HAPPINESS" (Powers), June 8.—A big picture, full of contrasts, showing many characters, rich and poor. The scenes and backgrounds are often lovely. They were taken on the upper part of Manhattan Island, and, although chosen to make artistic pictures, are typical views of old country places in this neighborhood. The story is romantic; it shows how the poor niece of a snobbish woman of wealth captures the young man her rich cousin wants. It ought to be a popular film. It has, besides lovely scenes, good acting, acceptable players, and much grace.

"HOW SHE BECAME HER HUSBAND'S WIFE" (Eclair), June 11.—A picture by the American company telling a peculiar story of very advanced, very sophisticated people. The situation is one that has certainly never been used before. Few would dare use it; yet it doesn't really cross the line of what is permitted. The heroine married a man whom she thought she didn't love, so that she wouldn't have to go back to school, and did it with the purpose of getting a divorce in two years to marry a man, already chosen, and a friend of her husband. Her husband was, in the meantime, to travel, leaving her at home. This is a situation that only could be possible among very vulgar people. The picture has this grace that she falls in love with her husband, and turns from the former sweetheart. It is a well-made picture, well photographed, and well acted.

"LET NO MAN PUT ASUNDER" (Imp), June 13.—A story of married life in which the husband and father is a drunken sot. The wife leaves him and gets a divorce. In the meantime, the man who has fallen in love with her meets and helps her former husband to reform, but doesn't know who he is. She finds him a decent man when she comes back, and, because of the child, they are re-united in spite of everything. It isn't a very emotional picture; no love story with divorce playing so prominent a part could be at all romantic. It is romance that gives power to stories of love. Divorce stories might be powerful as psychological studies and, as such, this is very interesting, although it is so written that the interest lies almost wholly in the plot. The acting and the players are very praiseworthy; the scenes are very good, and they are well photographed.

"MEMORIES OF A PIONEER" (Bison, 101), June 11.—The old pioneer dreams of days when the West was wild. His memories tell a love story which opens in a big caravan, horses, cattle and wagons; this is en route to some new settlement. Indians attack the settlers, and the lovers, spooning out on the hills, see them in time to give warning. The red men are beaten off. It is a big, thrilling picture, very well made, full of grand scenes and a sure feature. The photographs are good. It has the same qualities as these big Bison feature releases.

"THE SQUATTER'S CHILD" (Nestor), June 12.—A dramatic picture with a big thrill. It is a love story of a rich man's son (Jack Conway), and the pretty daughter of a squatter on his father's land. The girl in a recent Nestor picture played "The Mountain Daisy." The story doesn't work out along the usual lines, for both parents are pleased with the match. There is, however, a half-witted character in the neighborhood who is jealous. He is used to carry the story over a terribly thrilling climax in which we see the lovers talking on a little bridge and underneath it a box of dynamite sticks with a lighted fuze. The means taken to bring the denouement are also fresh and unexpected. It is an effective picture, well planned, strongly acted and beautifully photographed. A good offering.

"THE BELLE OF BAR Z RANCH" (Nestor), June 10.—The belle was a bit of a hot-head when she was jealous. She gave her fiance his walking papers in a manner that left to him no hope or doubt. Then she proposed to marry any man who could catch and take her from her horse in a fair race. The race is pictured. Her fiance wins her in it, and she seems glad. The other girls also heard about the race, and the justice had all he could do that afternoon "splicing" couples. It is brisk, has good comedy spirit, fine horses, and swift riding; these qualities are always popular. The characters are human and one can easily sympathize with them. The camera work is good.

GAUMONT POSTCARDS.

The advance publicity demand on the two forthcoming Gaumont two-reel features, "Bells of Paradise," hand-colored, with a tail-piece "By the Zuyder Zee," to be released on Thursday, June 20th, and "Written in Blood," a black-and-white battle story to be released on the 4th day of July, has been so heavy that the Gaumont Company has arranged to have a full supply of post-card illustrations to aid the exhibitor in his encouragement of patronage on the days when these Gaumont pictures are being exhibited in his house. Two designs are already off the press, both being exact reproductions of the three-sheet lithographs accompanying each of these afore-mentioned productions.

The post-card idea is purely a novelty and depends entirely for its continuance upon the eagerness which the exhibitors display in procuring them. By application to the Flushing office of the Gaumont Company this concern will be pleased to supply anyone with samples of these cards.

NEW BUCKLEN THEATER.

Mr. F. S. Timmis, business manager of the New Bucklen Theater, Elkhart, Ind., writes that he has just installed a new Edison Model B Exhibition Kinetoscope with economizer, and is so equipped that he can take care of all local feature film business. The capacity of the New Bucklen Theater is 950, seating 550 in the orchestra and 400 in the balcony. Mr. Timmis says that he has the best location in the city.

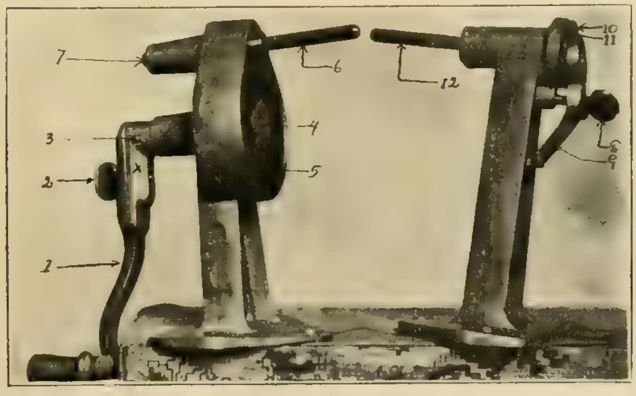
MOTOR REWINDING. A great many times during the past two or three years, I have called attention to the damage done to films in rewinding. In the old days, when the film was run into a tank, instead of into a take-up, practically the only damage the film was subjected to in the way of rain marks, was caused by "pulling down" in rewinding. I guess you all know what pulling down is, but I will nevertheless explain that it consists in holding one reel stationary while revolving the other, thus causing the entire film roll to slip on itself under considerable pressure.

Now there is always more or less dust and dirt on the film, and some of the particles are very hard, so that when the roll slips on itself in pulling down, there are minute scratches formed both in the celluloid and emulsion, but more particularly in the latter. These scratch marks soon fill up with dirt so that they show on the screen in the form of a dark mark, and it is these marks which we call "rain." The necessity for pulling down is largely due to the fact that the rewinders are usually geared pretty high in order to facilitate the process of rewinding, and this makes it very hard for the operator to rewind his film tightly. The film rewinds in a loose roll, and the operator is practically compelled to pull it down tight. Thence comes the damage.

Now, all this could very readily be obviated by rewinding with a motor of sufficient power to do the work against a considerable tension, thus rewinding the film roll tightly, and obviating the necessity for pulling down. Where the motor is used, it has the further advantage that rewinding need not be done at race-horse speed. The operator can get things ready, start the motor going, and if it takes even as much as five minutes to rewind a reel, there is no harm done. In this connection, I wish to call attention to a new rewinder just placed on the market. This device embodies features present, so far as I know, in no other rewinder, and features which are very excellent indeed, too. It is called the Smith Rewinder. Referring to the picture, the crank 1, is removed from crank casting X, by taking out thumb screw 2. Crank casting X may be removed from spindle 4, by driving out pin 3, which allows of the attachment of a belt wheel for motor drive, in place of the crank. Spindle 6 carries the reel on which the film is being rewound. This spindle may be removed by taking out screw 7. Spindle 12 carries the reel from which the film is being rewound. On the opposite end of spindle 12 is a steel washer 10, and between washer 10 and the hub of casting 13 is a leather washer 11. Steel washer 10 is fastened to spindle 12 by a screw in such a manner that it is held rigidly thereto, and revolves therewith. Casting 9 is held in place by wing-nut 8 and bears at its lower end on casting 13, and at its upper end on steel washer 10. When wing-nut 8 is tightened, steel washer 10 is forced against leather washer 11, which in return is compressed between washer 10 and main frame casting 13, thus supplying tension to the reel on spindle 12. It will be noted that the castings lean or tilt backwards. This is so that there is no necessity for fastening the reel to the spindles. It is just slipped on and is held there by gravity.



With the device just described belted to a motor, the reel could be rewound without any pulling down at all, and I may say that this rewinder therefore has my most hearty approval. It is well made mechanically, as well as being quite substantial. In the picture, the two standards are placed facing each other, instead of being in line as they would be in rewinding. This is done merely to show all the parts in one cut. In use, the two Standards would be placed in the ordinary way, of course.

STANDARD MACHINE.—New York (name of town suppressed), writes: "I have a Standard machine 110 volt, A.C., with a 10 foot picture at 50 feet. I am getting the best light I have ever seen produced with A.C., and the picture is almost flickerless. It receives a great deal of praise. I have had this machine for two years and three months, and the cost for repairs has been very low indeed. In fact, the only cost has been for new threads on the carbon clamp set screws. The machine is used every day, and I think it stands up fine. What is your verdict? There is only one fault I find with this mechanism, viz: The governor which controls the automatic fire shutter does not act quickly enough; that is to say, it allows the shutter to drop too soon, and does not raise it soon enough. As the manufacturers has made no provision for adjustment, I had the screw holes in the flat rods which connect the governor weight with the governor head which slides up and down on the vertical shaft, changed, shortening the flat rods somewhat. This has caused the shutter to act quicker at slow speed, and gives more satisfactory results generally. I hope the Standard people have remedied this in their later model."

The performance of your Standard machine certainly is very good indeed, and I am glad to hear that you are securing such excellent results. The matter of the governor is referred to the American Moving Picture Machine Co., for attention. I can say, however, that your complaint is well grounded, at least in so far as the old model machine is concerned. The governor of the Standard machine, while it is strong and very positive in its action, still it does not act as quickly as it should. I agree with you that therefore it seems to be up to the manufacturers to remedy that slight defect.

A LONGER THROW.—Manitoba, Can. (name of town suppressed by request), writes: "We have a 40 foot throw, generate our own current, and get about 110 volts, which is capacity. We are increasing our throw to about 75 or 80 feet. By using a 120 foot lens, could I get the same result at 80 feet, as at 40 feet, or would it be necessary to increase the voltage in order to have as good a picture? Our picture at 40 feet is very bright."

I would suggest, my brother, that you procure a hand-book immediately. The voltage has very little more to do with the brilliancy of your illumination, than the hair on your head has. The thing which governs curtain brilliancy is amperes. No, you could not very well get the same results at 80 feet that you would at 40, however, inasmuch as the results at 80 feet would be better, or should be better, than those at 40, I presume you would be satisfied. I don't know what you mean by a "120 foot lens." If you had followed the department closely, you would have seen that I have time and again explained to our readers that ordinarily a much better picture will be had at 75 and 100 feet, than can be gotten with a shorter throw; the size of the picture being the same in each case. This is by reason of the fact, that the short focal length lens is a very poor proposition. It has such heavy curvature that spherical aberration and other faults of a smaller nature are almost always present, at least in some degree. So far as the light is concerned, it makes little or no difference whether you project a 10 foot picture 40 feet or 80 feet. The moment you increase the size of the picture, however, you will cut down its brilliancy very materially, and will be obliged to increase your amperage. I would again suggest that you send $1.50 to the Moving Picture World for a copy of the hand-book, and study up on these various points.

OCEAN STEAMSHIP SERVICE.—Ind. (name of town suppressed), asks the following questions: "(a) Do ocean liners have moving pictures on board ship? (b) If so, how do operators secure these positions? (c) What are the qualifications as regards holding a union or license card? (d) If I send you stamped and addressed envelope, would you answer me personally on this subject?"

The friend will find his inquiries fully covered in one of the letters answered last week. If you wish personal reply to questions asked, enclose the sum of $1.00. This fee is necessary, since I do not feel able to answer 30 or 40 personal letters a day, as I would be obliged to do should I reply personally on receipt of a stamped envelope.

FROM WEST VIRGINIA.—Mr. E. G. Hensen, Manager New Opera House, Charleston, W. Va., writes: "The World still comes this way every Tuesday, and I wait around the news-stand just like a poor boy away from home who is expecting a bunch of 'long green,' waits around the post office until it arrives. The picture business throughout this section is on the upward path. I have been having a bill at my theatre, The new Opera House, consisting of four acts of vaudeville and three reels of pictures, but the silent acts (pictures) receive more applause than do the actors themselves. So just to find out how the dear public likes picture I cut out the vaudeville entirely, and am now putting on six reels of licensed pictures. My receipts have increased fully 20% since doing this. We try our level best to give a good show, and believe we are doing it. My employees are all uniformed. I am using an orchestra of eight pieces, playing the better grades of music only. My picture is 15 feet, and as clear as the best of them. My operating room is the best to be had. Its dimensions are 12 x 6 feet by 9 feet high. The ceiling is built after an idea of my own. It consists of two big funnels, so that the entire thing goes to two points, in each of which is a 12-inch pipe, making a Y to one pipe of the same size out through the roof of the theatre, thus carrying off all heat which comes from machines, etc. We use two machines, never allowing the sheet to be without a picture, and we also keep an extra mechanism, thus giving us three machines, all of which are Edison Model B. That is another reason why I shall certainly keep this week's issue of The World, which contains much needed instructions on that mechanism. One reason the picture game is not dying out is that each state is now forming, or has already formed its own exhibitors' league. I am proud to say I am a member of the one in our own state, and I hope to see you at some of our conventions in the near future. That I am an earnest supporter of The Moving Picture World goes without saying."

I was very much pleased with your letter for the very simple reason that it is written in the optimistic vein, and moreover is written by one who is evidently a "live wire." That operating room ceiling sounds good to me, but the pipes leading up to the roof from the vent branch should have been 18 or 24 inches in diameter. I will tell you why: Supposing you had a fire in the operating room; two 12-inch pipes would be ample to carry off all the smoke and flame up to the point of junction, but I am afraid the pipe above would be too small. It serves every purpose of ventilation, of course, just as well as the larger pipe would, but in case of fire, you would find that the 24-inch pipe would be far superior. Your scheme of having three machines is certainly a good one, but I want to talk over one matter with you, viz: the keeping of the picture on the screen all the time. It has been the experience of some of the best managers in the country that this is not very good practice, and I personally believe myself that it is not. I think it is much better to have at least thirty seconds' intermission between each picture, even though it be between two pictures on a split reel. There is a reason for this, as there is for about everything in this world, viz: it gives the audience a chance to "catch its breath." It helps the mind to lose the impression of one picture, and thus places it in a more receptive mood for the next one. I might explain this more fully by citing a person who reads the stories in a magazine. When you finish one story, you naturally pause a moment and "think it over" before starting another. Never, in all your life, I venture to say, did you read a story and then read right on into another one without pausing. I think the same holds good with pictures, and I would advise you to leave the house dark for at least 15 seconds between each picture, and 30 seconds would be better yet; or you can throw on the house lights if you wish during that interval, and at the same time announce the next picture, but do not make the pause exceed one minute. I think you understand what I am getting at. Try it out and see what you make of it. Brother Hensen's letterhead reads: "E. G. Hensen, the Irish Manager," from which, by a process of intricate deduction, I have arrived at the conclusion that he is not a Swede. Come again, Brother Hensen, I am glad to hear from you at any time.

MISSTATEMENTS.—Rockford, Ill., severely criticises Mr. David S. Hulfish, Electricity Magazine Corporation, Chicago, Ill., for an article in which it seems Mr. Hulfish attempted to explain the reasons for the prohibition of motor driven projection machines. Rockford quotes Mr. Hulfish as follows: "The real reason why motors were prohibited is that if the film sticks in the film gate and the operator is at the time reading a novel or a letter from his best friend, the upper feed sprocket will run the film out all over the table, and when it would touch the lamphouse there would be an explosion."

Rockford evidently wishes us to take Mr. Hulfish to task, and if he, Mr. Hulfish, is correctly quoted, he certainly ought to be taken to task too, but we cannot waste more time criticising such statements. We are, however, surprised that a man like Mr. Hulfish, who has compiled two rather pretentious volumes of instructions to operators, should make such a statement as this. Possibly the gentleman is misquoted. We should like to see a copy of the article in question. Assuming the quotation to be correct, however, we would respectfully inform Mr. Hulfish that under the conditions named, there would not and could not possibly be anything even faintly resembling an explosion, though there would be a mighty big lot of excitement around there for two or three minutes, unless the reel happened to be a N. I. film, in which case nothing out of the ordinary would occur except the stopping of the machine for a couple of minutes. Rockford says that such an article has a bad effect in Rockford theatres, due to the fact that Rockford has experienced one fire, and since that time the least noise in the operating room makes them all stand up and take notice. Rockford has the largest operating room in his city, the same being 13½ x 6 feet by 6 feet high. Motiograph machine, 1910 model. McIntosh stereopticon double throw switch on two rheostats. Operating room lined with No. 18 steel.

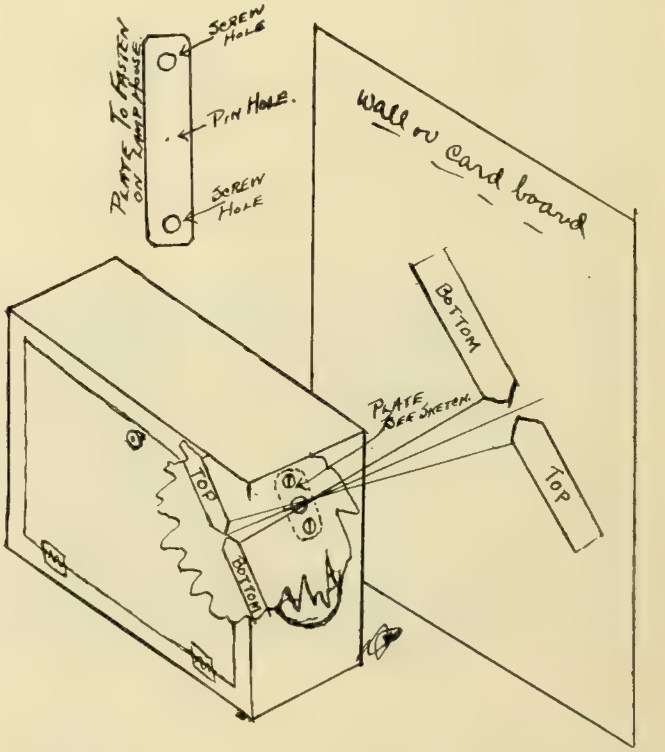
OUT OF FOCUS.—Antwerp, N. Y., writes: "I am using a Powers 5, with rheostat; have a 45-foot throw, and a 9-foot picture. The center of the picture seems blurred. It is especially noticeable on the titles, consisting of a sort of a fog or haze. How can I overcome it? The light seems to be perfect and the picture is sharp otherwise."

Examine your aperture plate, and I think you will find either one of two things, viz: (a) The aperture plate tracks worn. (b) Tension springs not bearing squarely on the tracks. The trouble probably is due to the film bulging either in or out in passing over the aperture; that is to say, it does not lie flat as it passes over the aperture. It is, of course, barely possible that the trouble lies in your projection lens. If you find everything all right at the aperture, then get your exchange to lend you another lens. If that remedies the difficulty, you know where it lies, and it is possible that one of the lenses which make up the combinations is in backwards. It is also barely possible that there is a finger mark on one of the lenses of the projection lens. It does not follow that because you cannot see the finger mark by looking through the lens that it is not present. It may be very faint and be on the inside of one of the lenses. In one of these things you will unquestionably find your trouble.

MOTOR DRIVES.—New York City sends in a clipping from the New York World, in which statement is made that eighty were killed in a moving picture theater in Spain, the fire being caused by an "explosion" of the film. He asks that we condemn such reports so that he can clip it out and paste it in the box office windows for the benefit of his patrons. He then continues: "Here is a plan of my own on a Standard machine. I have tried for two months to evlove some scheme for driving the machine by motor without using the flywheel. Have finally hit upon a plan which works so well that you cannot hear the machine run, whereas when belting to the fly-wheel, and running a twelve minute reel, the noise is very bad. Another thing which proves that the fly-wheel belting is wrong: put the crank on and run at a speed of 85. The picture is excellent—could not be better. Run at the same speed, driving the machine by a motor belted to the fly-wheel, and the picture is doing a Highland Fling all over the screen. How do you account for that? Here is the arrangement I have fixed up. It may be copied by any brother who runs a Standard machine by motor."

The brother then proceeds to describe his way of driving a Standard, but I was unable to follow him. As near as I can make it out, he bolts a grooved pulley to the sprocket wheel on the end of the crank shaft, but apparently he had a small counter shaft also. I wish the brother would give me a more explicit explanation of his motor drive scheme, or if not too far out of the way, I will be glad to go and look at it myself, since it appears, from what the brother says, that it has real value. As to the explosion matter, if he will look back through the files of the department, he will find where I have given this matter plenty of attention, and he can clip out exactly what he wants. The reason the picture jumps when belted to fly-wheel is probably because the added strain wears the bushings badly, thus allowing the cam-shaft, which carries the fly-wheel, to jump. Now it is the cam which imparts motion to the star and you can readily see what the effect would be. If the shaft jumped the cam would jump too and that would probably spell trouble on the screen.

PIN HOLE PROJECTOR.—Chicago, Ill., writes as follows: "Here is something which has helped me very much, and I pass it along for the benefit of others. By its use you can always see just how your carbons are burning without any injury to your eyes. It is the principle used in the first camera ever made—a pin hole. I have found the best way is to drill about an eighth, or a quarter-inch hole in the side of the lamp-house, opposite the arc, and put a piece of tin over that with a pin hole in it. This hole should be very small and the best way to make it is as follows: Get a small needle. Get a cork about ¾ inch long from your druggist. Push the needle through the cork so that the point will just barely come through, and then break off the rest of the head of the needle even with the cork. Now set your cork on the piece of tin, which should rest on a piece of soft wood, with the point of the needle where you want the hole, and hit the top of the cork a sharp blow with the hammer. The needle will go through the tin, making a very small, nice round hole. File off the burr, and you are ready to fasten it to your lamphouse with screws. You will see only the parts of the carbon on the wall which are giving you your light, viz.: the crater and the negative carbon tip. The image will, however, be reversed that is to say, upside down."



The pin-hole arc projector has been described in these columns several times. We, however, give the brother's letter space on account of his method of punching a very small hole in tin. We have found personally that a hole 1-16 of an inch in diameter gives very good results, but, of course, the smaller the hole, the sharper the image will be, though if made too small, the image is likely to be quite faint. On the whole, I think I would prefer a hole about 1-32 of an inch in diameter.

A DENIAL.—Erie, Pa., writes: "In the issue of June 8, in the article of machine troubles, Erie, Pa., there were absolutely no machine troubles present in the operating room when I left. I had just put in a complete new intermediate movement. Once in a great while, if the carbons were not set just right, there appeared a ghost, which however, was hardly discernable. I had tried everything the hand-book suggested, which, by the way, I would not be without at any price, except bringing my condensers closer together. I worked as an assistant to a union operator who was one of the best in the business at that time, for two years. I believe such an apprenticeship ought to fit any man, no matter how dumb he might be, for operating. Besides two years and a half of experience, I have been a constant reader of The Moving Picture World, and have a copy of your instruction book. I trust you will make this slight correction, as it is due to myself, who was the 'retiring operator' spoken of in the letter in question."

I cannot, of course, take sides in such a spat as this, but the brother's letter is certainly very moderate in its tone, when one considers that he feels himself to be the aggrieved party. By the intermediate movement, I presume he means the intermittent movement. Yes, an apprenticeship of two years should fit any man to become an operator, if he is capable of becoming one at all, but it would not fit any man, regardless of how "dumb" he might be, since, as I have time and again set forth in this department, the really high class operator must possess brains, and know how to use them. I would suggest to the "retiring operator" that the formation of an operators' union in Erie, Pa., would be an excellent proposition, and he should be among the first to join.

ADDRESS WANTED.—Illinois (name of town suppressed), writes: "Will you kindly advise me as to where and to whom I can make application for membership in an operator's union? The nearest is, I believe, in Chicago, sixteen miles from here, but I am unable to locate the address. Do you know when the Chicago examinations for license take place? Please do not publish this letter."

There is nothing in your letter barring it from publication, and you could not otherwise receive a reply, since letters are replied to personally only where a fee is enclosed, the minimum being $1.00. I will forward your letter to Mr. Lee Hart, General Secretary, I. A. T. S. E., Chicago, Ill., who will supply you with the necessary information concerning the making of application for membership in an operators' union. I have not the present address of the Chicago union, and would suggest it would be to the advantage of that organization if I were kept informed on such matters. I don't know when the Chicago examinations take place, but presume an applicant can be examined almost any time. Probably one or two days a week are set apart for that purpose. I would suggest to Mr. Havill, head of the Board of Examiners, that he should supply us with the necessary information concerning such things, in order that it may be published for the information of all concerned. I am glad to give space to such matters, provided the officials supply necessary data, and such things of right ought to be published. It is a duty Mr. Havill owes to the operators, both of Chicago and the country at large, to supply all the data concerning such matters for publication. It is up to you, friend William.

SLIDES.—Easthampton, Mass., writes: "Kindly give the formula of the compound used to treat slides, in order to be able to write on them with a common pen and ink. The glass to be clear and only show the writing on the screen. We have tried this without using anything, and find it is impossible owing to the fact that the ink floods."

Wash your glasses perfectly clean with soap and water; scald them with boiling water, polishing afterwards, so as to remove all traces of oil or grease. Next dissolve one ounce of gum arabic in ½ pint of water (I am not sure about the amount of water, but think that is about right) and dip the glasses in this solution, letting them dry afterwards. You can then write on the glass with an ordinary pen and ink without trouble. A great many use white ink with just plain clear glass. This works very well. We would, however, suggest the use of gelatine. The outfits, supplied by The Utility Transparency Co., 1733 West 9th Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., are giving excellent satisfaction. Slides made by the gelatine process cost less than one cent each and may be made with a typewriter, which is much neater than pen and ink writing.

DON'T.—East Tawas, Mich., writes: "Have a building 75 feet deep, the ceiling of which is only 11 feet. The landlord will allow me to cut out the ceiling 12 x 20 feet, which will allow me to place my machine upstairs, with a 20 foot throw, and an 8 or 10 foot drop. This plan will also give me more ceiling room, as I can then do away with the operating room downstairs. What do you advise on same; also tell me what size moving picture stereopticon and condensing lenses I will have to obtain to get a fair size picture? Picture is now 10 x 12, at a 50 foot throw."

The only advice I can give you on that proposition is "don't." With a 20 foot throw you could not possibly project a decent sized picture and when you add that amount to the drop, why the result would be something fearful and wonderful to behold. To get a 10 foot picture at 20 feet, you would have to have about a two inch E. F. lens, and that is entirely out of the question. You could get a very fair 10 foot picture at 40 feet, but you would have more or less trouble, particularly if you use a machine having an outside shutter. Better stick to that 50 foot throw. It is short enough.

A DISPUTE.—Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I am one of the readers who has enjoyed the Projection Department very much. Recently, while discussing matters with an operator friend, we found something upon which we could not agree, or rather neither of us could decide what was right. We are going to ask you to kindly give us the information. The questions are as follows: (a) Will 15 amperes at 220 volts give as good and brilliant illumination to a given size picture as 30 amperes at 110 volts? (b) Will two 30 ampere rheostats in series give the same amount of light, or more, on 220, than one 30 ampere rheostat at 110 volts; both having the same picture and same throw?"

Quite plainly you are badly mixed in your ideas as to resistance, my brother. The volts have nothing whatever to do with the matter of illumination. Regardless of whether you have 220 volts or 110 volts on the line, you have only 48 volts (about) at the arc. The rest of the pressure being used up in the rheostat. That is exactly what the rheostat is for, to reduce the voltage from the line pressure to the arc voltage, and the voltage averages about 48 with D. C., and 35 with A. C., therefore 15 amperes from a 220 volt line would give precisely the same illumination as would 15 amperes from a 110 volt line. Your question (b) brings up the whole matter of resistance. On pages 8 and 9 of the hand-book, you will find directions how to figure such matters but, together with that, notice the correction on the fly leaf in the front of the book, next the title page. I could not reply to the question, as you have not said what voltage the rheostats are. You might have two 110 volt, 30 ampere rheostats, or two 30 ampere 220 volt rheostats in series on a 110 volt line, presumably, however, they are 110 volt rheostats. Assuming that the two in series are 110 volt rheostats, and that the current is 220 volt D. C., then the problem would be: (110 — 48 ÷ 30) x 2 which result divided by 220 — 48 will give you approximately the number of amperes you would get through two 110 volt, 30 ampere rheostats hitched in series on 220 D. C.

RED HOT ROAST.—I am in receipt of a letter from Los Angeles, Cal., which is a red hot roast on the examination given operators in that city. The writer declares the examination is a farce, but a farce which costs the applicant for license the sum of $5.00 per year. He also makes the assertion that a school in that city has turned out operators in two weeks' time, and that the "professor" tells the students perhaps that time may be shortened to ten or twelve days. I would not care to publish this letter without having some of the statements contained therein corroborated. I would be glad to hear from the Los Angeles operators' union, if there is one, as regards the situation in that city, particularly as to license and schools. I thank the brother for the interest he has taken in writing the letter, but he must remember that we have to be a little careful, and know that what is contained in letters is correct, particularly where they make charges, such as this letter contains. I might add that up to date the information from Los Angeles has been very conflicting.

WANTS TO JOIN THE UNION.—North Carolina (name of town suppressed), writes: "Would you please advise me whether or not it is possible for a N. C. operator to become a member of the I. A. T. S. E., or some other operators' union. I have operated for about five years, and desire to become affiliated with the operators' organization. If this is possible, please give me the particulars and the address of the nearest organization."

I do not think you would be eligible under the six months' law, which requires that you reside for that period of time within the jurisdiction of the union you seek to join. I would suggest that you write to Mr. Lee Hart, State Hotel, State and Harrison Sts., Chicago, Ill., General Secretary of the I. A. T. S. E., enclosing a stamped envelope, and ask whether you are eligible to membership in any local, and if so, what one.

MASSACHUSETTS LAWS.—Lynchburg, Va., would like very much to know the laws of the State of Massachusetts regarding moving picture theaters. He says: "I have always heard they were very severe regarding operating rooms, wiring and exits. For instance: With a seating capacity of 300 or less, do you know what exits are demanded and in what part of the house (side or rear), or whether a small balcony is allowed, the size of the operating room, and whether asbestos, steel or sheet metal walls are acceptable?"

It is my intention to quote the Massachusetts law relative to moving picture machines and operating rooms fully, and comment thereon, as soon as I can spare the space to do it. Meanwhile I believe if you will write to the Inspection Department of the District Police, of Boston, Mass., asking for a copy of the laws and regulations relating to moving pictures, enclosing say ten cents in stamps, the same will be sent you, and it will give you the information concerning moving picture machines, operating rooms, etc. I might say, however, that asbestos is the material demanded for operating room walls, though I don't believe the department would have the nerve to turn down brick, concrete or hollow tile, if properly constructed. Steel is not allowed, and it should not be. I am not posted as to the number of exits required, or their location, nor do I know whom to refer you to for this information. The District Police could probably tell you.

CALIFORNIA.—(Name of town suppressed), writes: "Is there any excuse for a picture being out of focus the first show and as clear as a bell the next show. This happens with me nearly every night. Throw 88 ft., 16 foot picture; two seven and a half condensers; Power's Six; 110 volt, 60 cycle current, A. C.; Bio cored carbons; H. & H. transformer; use 50 amperes. When I use 60 amperes the carbons needle and light is not as good as when only 50 amperes are used. The out of focus effect only appears during the first show and during that time there seems to be a kind of a mist or haze over the picture. You will no doubt conclude, as I did, that the fault lies in the light, but if it does I am unable to locate it. At 50 amperes the light is fine, no ghost and a clear field. Condensers and lens both clean, contacts are all in good shape. This is the first trouble that I ever had that I could not overcome, but this has surrounded my goat. Any suggestions that you can make will be greatly appreciated, or if any of the other brothers have run up against this annoying proposition and have overcome it, I would be pleased to know their remedy. In the last three months I have had at least eight condensers turn either purple or yellow. Last week I bought four condensers and three of them have turned already. This is getting rather expensive and I would be pleased to learn of a make that will hold their color. I take the condensers out every day and clean them and if I find any trace of color, I put a new one in its place. I have always run a perfect picture and it is my aim to do so now, for this reason I have tried to explain my trouble in full to enable you to locate it."

Your information is very complete, but it is nevertheless difficult to say with certainty what causes your trouble. If you have the old style tension springs, instead of the newer rigid shoe, examine them and see if they are not loose and shifting from side to side. It is possible that some of the reels are dryer than others, and have a tendency to buckle slightly over the aperture plate. However, I hardly think this is the answer. The only advice I could give you is to carefully examine everything in relation to your gate tension springs and if your aperture plate tracks are worn, put on a new aperture plate. If any of the brothers have had a similar experience, let us hear from them. Condensers which discolor are imperfect, and you should return them to your dealer, demanding others in their place. Such condensers are nothing more or less than a swindle, although the dealers themselves might have been perfectly innocent in purchasing them. I cannot, in this department recommend any certain brand of goods; however if those who purchase faulty lenses of that kind would promptly return them and demand their money back, the dealers would soon cease to buy from makers putting out such poor goods and the trouble would disappear. It is due to an excessive amount of an ingredient used in making optical glass. By the way, it is possible there is moisture inside your projection lens. In fact, inasmuch as the trouble only occurs during the first reel I guess that is it. Open the lens and heat it, putting together again while warm.

FUSES.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "Would like to ask you about fuses. I had an arch light, taking 40 amperes. Would it be all right to use 45 ampere fuses, allowing 5 amperes over? If not, what kind would be right?"

In the first place, your letter is unsigned St. Louis, therefore would not receive attention. In the second place, you are not in a small town, but in a large city, and I don't feel disposed to answer such "kindergarten" questions propounded by a man who calls an arc light an "arch" light. Where a man is in a large city and has the opportunity extended to serve an apprenticeship under a capable operator, he should be made to do it.

I. B. E. W.—Our old friend, W. S. Turnpaugh, of Ft. Worth, Texas, writes: "I have tried the carbon soaking stunt as directed by Ft. Worth, and find it to be all right. I desire to correct something concerning our union published in a recent issue. We organized under the I. B. E. W., and are now affiliated with the A. F. of L. Have 20 or 21 members and applications out for six more. Officers are as follows: W. S. Turnpaugh, Pres.; E. P. Dodds, V.-Pres.; J. M. Smith, Fin. Sec., and S. A. Austin, Treas. I am running two Simplex machines. They are very good, except the flicker is a little too much in evidence. We run Independent pictures and are doing our share of business and then some. Why in the world don't those Gaumont people, or the Sales Company arrange their weekly so that those horrible misframes will not occur? They seem to come at every change of scene, and are an abominable nuisance."

The trouble complained of is doubtless due to the fact that different cameras are used for the taking of different scenes. We would suggest to the Gaumont people that if this is the case, the cameras used for the weekly should be by all means of one standard. Misframes due to cameras of different standard are very, very bad indeed, for the reason that there is no possible way of remedying the trouble. Do I understand that you have severed your I. B. E. W. affiliation and affiliated directly with the A. F. of L., or that the latter affiliation comes through the I. B. E. W.? We would suggest that you would do better to get in the band wagon with the other operators and affiliate with the I. A. T. S. E. Mr. Lee Hart, State Hotel, Chicago, Ill., can fix you up should you at any time desire to do this.

A COMPLAINT.—Mr. Edwin G. Hess, York, Pa., writes "I happened on an article you wrote, when you were an exhibitor, issue of December 31, 1909, entitled 'Get the Money vs. Square Dealing.' Now that article appeals to me; also it fits my case exactly. I took hold of a house that could not be run by one person for a period longer than two months without a failure. I have run this place four years, and have made good by following your policy as set forth in that article. I have had some strong opposition houses that run eight reels (I run only three), and others who run four reels with three acts of vaudeville. Notwithstanding all this, however, I am still holding my own, but I don't run the reels through at break-neck speed. I show them as they should be shown. My idea is that the customer who becomes a regular patron is worth a hundred that only come once a year. I am here to stay and people coming to my house who go away pleased usually return, and bring some one else with them, so that the business has gradually grown and is steady. I have always tried to be honest with my patrons. What is advertised on the outside, you will see inside, and see it right at that. And now I have a complaint to make: some time ago I sent an order to a poster supply company in Pittsburgh for eight-sheet posters of the 'Indian Massacre' and the 'Battle of the Redmen' (Bison). I received posters, but did not use them, for the reason that the first named was a fake, pure and simple; being simply a fight between Buffalo Bill and some Indians, and had printed on it 'Buffalo Bill Avenging the Death of His Mother.' The second showed a stage coach attacked by Indians, and with the wording 'A Realistic Attack on a Stage Coach.' I received a letter from the firm saying these were the posters for the above reels. I intimated in my reply that they had a poor way of doing business and they replied that I was a sore-head, afterwards acknowledging that they had not the real eight-sheet posters for these subjects. Was I right in kicking or not?"

You were certainly entirely justified in your kick, and I thoroughly agree with you that you did not get a square deal, provided the facts are as set forth. Yes, I am sure that it pays to be honest with one's audience, and not only give them what you advertise, but put the show on in the best possible manner. I believe this pays, even where the trade is largely transient. I know of certain theatres in Chicago which injured their business tremendously because they thought theirs was all transient trade, and therefore anything would do. The people will not come back anyhow, was their argument and it was a fact that, in a way, the trade was transient; but it was also a fact that it soon became known all around that the shows at these houses were very poor and it nearly put one or two out of business before they discovered the fact that no trade is entirely transient, and that the man who skins his audience will eventually himself get skinned.

RADIANT VELLUM SCREEN.—Marietta, Pa., Samuel Acri, proprietor and manager of the Photo Play Theatre, writes: "I notice in recent issue of the department you have had several inquiries regarding the 'Radiant Vellum Screen,' manufactured by Williams, Brown & Earl, Philadelphia, Pa. I also note your comment, in which you say you have no knowledge of the screen in question. I am very glad to be able to furnish some information as regards this matter, being a user of one of the screens, which I have had for about four months. I bought it direct from the makers. The cloth or 'Radiant Vellum' is 22 inches in width. I cut it in four pieces of equal length, and sewed them together, making a screen about 16 x 20 feet, costing me approximately $40.00. The screeen has a bright, smooth finish, which is there to stay. It shows an absolutely clear picture, having a very natural tone, but the best of its features is it does not increase the flicker. My picture, being about 18 feet, almost fills the screen, and with 35 amperes I obtain a clearer picture than many others I have seen of smaller size. I may add that some months ago, we were fortunate in being able to exhibit the Milano Dante's 'Inferno,' and the owner of the films stated that they had never been shown as nicely as here in my theatre, which is the only one in a city of 2,000. This is my fourth letter to you, and I feel I am becoming tiresome, but allow me to add that there is surely something in salting the carbons. I discovered two tablespoonfulls of salt in a tin box large enough to lay them in, with about ⅛ of an inch water, and roll them in it for about 20 seconds, so that the outside alone gets treated, and after being dried, I get a brighter and steadier light than I do with untreated carbons. I have tried to soak the inside of the carbons also, but they flame too much, as well as having a tendency to coat the condenser with a gray substance similar to a veil. I would not be without properly treated carbons for double the amount of trouble it is to treat them. I wish both The Moving Picture World and your valuable department success."

In the first place, friend Acri, no correspondant who sends interesting and valuable matter ever becomes tiresome. Don't get any idea like that in your head. We are glad to have the report on the screen. We should think, however, that the seams would show badly. You say the surface is smooth. I had been given to understand there were two or three different surfaces to this screen, one being a rather rough matte surface. It is a strange thing, indeed, that the manufacturers of things of this kind do not immediately submit samples of their goods to this department. Failure to do so rather leads one to believe that their wares are not up to standard, since I have noticed that the man who has something good usually loses no time in doing everything he knows how to prove it. If you are projecting a really good picture, 18 feet wide with 35 amperes of current, then the screen must be a wonder. How badly do the seams in the screen show? As to what you say regarding the carbons, I will pass along to our readers without comment.

A STRONG WEEK FOR KLEINE.

Kleine's three releases for the week ending June 22nd are particularly attractive. There are two powerful dramas, teaching a moral, and a three-subject reel of unusual interest.

The Cines subject for Tuesday, June 18th, is "The Frailty of Man," and points out the evil consequences that are almost sure to follow when gambling gets its grip on a man. In this photoplay, a lively young man, who has developed a liking for cards, abuses the confidence of his chum, who chances to be more fortunate in the possession of wealth, and commits a crime, which although discovered, does not bring him to the punishment he so richly deserves, only because of the fact that his chum has fallen in love with the young rascal's sister. The story is well told, and excellently acted. There are scenes of comedy, which might almost warrant calling the piece a comedy-drama.

The Urban-Eclipse for Wednesday, June 19th, combines topical, educational, and scenic features, which are certain to meet with the approval of the public and the exhibitors. "The Motor Boat Races at Burnham-on-Crouch, England," show hair-raising contests between powerful, high-speed pleasure craft. Certainly a thrilling and pleasure-giving film. The second subject, "Studies of Fish Life," is an instructive as well as very interesting educational study, showing many of the lower forms of fish life, which are found in the ocean. The live strange creatures may be seen swimming about in all their natural freedom, darting in and out of the thick seaweed growths. The third subject is "Bergen, Norway," the second city of importance in that country, and the bird's-eye view of the harbor and fortress, and the scenes in and about the town are of unusual interest, and well worth seeing. The photography is particularly excellent.

Miss Marie Tissier, Eclipse Player.

"Her Vengeance," the Cines for Saturday, June 22nd, is one of the strongest dramas, as well as one of the most thrilling, this capable company has enacted so far this year. We are led by the story through scenes of peace and happiness; growing discontent, repugnance, and desperate resolve; attempted crime; a blazing house, with a helpless woman asleep within; her horrified awakening; frantic efforts to escape; the collapse all around her of the burning building; her quick change from a sweet and loving wife to a wild and raving maniac; her escape and flight from the burning ruins; her search for her criminal husband; and then surprising him enjoying the company of a young and beautiful woman, to whom he has become engaged; the husband's terror at seeing what he thinks to be an apparition; his frantic flight on horseback; the wife's pursuit on another horse; and, as a tragic and intense climax, the scene where she overtakes and hurls him over the brink of a precipice. The parts are splendidly acted by Gaston Monaldi as the villainous husband, Jeannette Trimble as the vengeful wife, and Josephine Scotti as the other woman in the case. Photography is perfect and the scenic investiture far above the average of this manufacturer, whose lavishness and attention to detail are so well known as to require no further comment.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE LAND OF MIGHT" (Nestor).

A very strong drama is "The Land of Might," produced by the Nestor Film Company, and to be released on June 19th. Powerful and gripping, this picture tells a tale of the land where possession is nine points of the law and where men's lives are counted as mere trifles when it's a question of deciding ownership. Directed by Milton H. Fahrney, and the principal characters portrayed by Jack Conway, Viola Barry and William Clifford, the production is a splendid one in every respect.

Scene from "The Land of Might" (Nestor).

Mary and John Anderson (Viola Barry and Jack Conway), two young home-seekers, are wandering over the plains in a prairie-schooner. As it is nearly supper time, John goes on a hunt for game and, during his absence, two of their horses become frightened and run off. Mary calls in vain for John and determines to go after them herself. Her search ends at the camping place of three gold seekers who have arrested the horses in their flight. Mary claims the horses and one of the men, Sid, is willing that they be returned to her, but not so his partner and the Mexican. The only way to settle the dispute is to fight it out and the partners fire upon each other, Mary's champion wounding his friend. Sid accompanies Mary to her camping place where John greets them, his gratitude overflowing at the kindness of Sid. He gives Sid his saddle-horse and Sid bids them adieu. Darkness falls and we see Mary and John slumbering peacefully, little dreaming of impending danger. A short distance from them stands the Mexican and the wounded partner, Bill, who has followed the footprints of Sid and Mary to this place and plans revenge. Sid, suspecting his partner, rides back to the camping place of the young couple, in time to see Bill creeping upon John, believing him to be Sid. Most thrilling is this scene and one's breath is held awaiting the outcome of Sid's appearance on the scene. He reaches the spot in time to wrest the knife from Bill's hand while John and Mary slumber on, unconscious of the scene being enacted so near. And when dawn comes, they awake, refreshed and happy, to begin their wanderings for a home once more.

Beautifully clear are these pictures of Nestor's and most wonderful backgrounds accompany the excellent photography.

"OVER THE DIVIDE" (Lubin).

"Over the Divide," which the Lubin Company will release June 29th, is, according to the reliable press agent, the best Western photoplay the firm have ever turned out. The story, written by F. G. Grandon, is suggestive of the sixties, when trials by jury were not encouraged by the boys of the Golden West. When sins were found out the sheriff and dread posse were quickly on the job, and the sinner was not put to the agony of suspense, or preparation for the long journey. It was all over in a few hours, and society slept peacefully. But commendable as the system was, mistakes were made and a man was sent to another world that would have been useful in this. The poor victim of Mr. Grandon's story was about as good a man as the wild country made, but he was caught in company of a road agent. That was pretty bad company, and the boys took no chances. "Birds of a feather flocked together" and it was safest "to kill the two birds with one stone." But a woman happened along. She didn't know or care about the guilt of the man. All she knew was she wanted him for herself; so, pretending to kiss him good-bye, she cut the rope that bound him. Then came the dash for liberty; the horses were game as were the man and girl riders. The chase was bravely waged for miles until the sign post of the Divide gave all a rest. The fugitives jumped to Mexico and the posse sadly returned to town. The Lubin Rough Riders are noted for dash and horsemanship and this picture will describe both men and horses at their best, not forgetting the girl, which is played by Clara Williams.

Scene from "Over the Divide" (Lubin).

BIRD'S-EYE VIEWS OF PANAMA AND THE CANAL.

Louis A. Geleng, cameraman, has returned from a trip to Panama and the Canal Zone, where he has been taking pictures of the "Big Ditch" two ways. At first views were taken from the platform of a flat car; then Mr. Geleng went up in the air with Aviator Clarence DeGiers and took views of the Canal and of the cities of Panama and Colon. It is expected that the venture will yield about two reels of interesting pictures which are owned by the Aviation Film Company.

"FANCHON, THE CRICKET" (Imp).

It is quite difficult to say which is the outstanding feature of this charming idyll—the fairy like story; the acting; or the settings. The latter are bound to be universally admired, as the Imp people have concentrated all their efforts to secure some of the prettiest scenes ever seen in a motion picture, and we are betraying no secret in saying that these scenes, while quite new to the motion picture, yet were chosen not many miles from New York, on the left bank of the Hudson.

The story is one by Georges Sands; it is of French origin and its time is that of the eighteenth century, which gives opportunity for some very effective costumes.

Fanchon, the Cricket, is a cute little girl under the influence of a witch, both of whom come more or less under suspicion for being allied with the powers of darkness. Witchcraft in Europe, yeare ago, was looked upon with real disfavor. Fanchon undergoes many vicissitudes and love adventures and is finally rescued from the witch's influence by the good Sisters. But love triumphs and she marries her lover in the end. Not, however, before there have been many picturesque adventures, in which her chivalrous sweetheart has participated.

Scene from "Fanchon, the Cricket" (Imp).

The characters of the witch, Mother Fadet, the lover, Landry, the half-witted brother, Didiei, are skillfully portrayed and the groupings and scenic accessories go to make up a very pretty picture.

The release comes as a distinct novelty amongst modern pictures, inasmuch as it takes us back into a past century, into another country and shows us a phase of peasant and religious life that will be utterly new to American motion picture audiences.

By those who have seen it, "Fanchon, the Cricket" is regarded as a very picturesque and poetic offering which will score an undoubted success.

ALASKA-SIBERIA PICTURES MOVE TO BROADWAY.

On June 3rd the Carnegie Museum Expedition in moving pictures terminated its engagement at the Maxine Elliott Theater and moved to the Broadway Theater. Owing to the greater amount of transient traffic on Broadway and the great size of the Broadway Theater, the management has seen its way clear to the institution of popular prices. The prices at the Broadway will be twenty-five and fifty cents. The pictures continue to draw and interest the people. At a recent exhibition Captain Kleinschmidt entertained as his especial guest Mr. Jack London, the noted writer of stories of Alaskan life.

"CLOWNLAND" (Imp).

This picture gives the little boy, Joe Moore, an opportunity of still further displaying his talents as a rising young actor. Poor kid, he longs to see a circus show, but cannot go, as he has not the money. So he dreams he is present. The dream is worked out by a clever troupe of circus performers corralled by the Imp Company to go through their work, which they do in a signally effective fashion. The illusion is heightened by the little boy seen asleep on a small throne. When it is all over, he wakes up much chagrined that it was all a dream in his case.

Scene from "Clownland" (Imp).

"The sweet little cherub that sits up aloft" to watch over the lives of poor kids comes along to hand him enough money to let him go to see the real show.

This is entirely a children's theme; it is clever, humorous, and sympathetic. Stage life is presented, of course, with fidelity and naturalness.

LUBIN'S CHILDREN ROUGH RIDERS.

The kiddies are a feature of the Lubin stock company, Joseph Smiley is the director and he takes a great pride in the unique pictures they play out. The leading man of the kiddies is Buster Johnson, only 3½ years old. He has been featured in many famous productions. Henrietta O'Beck, 4½ years old, is the leading lady; Brooks McCloskey, 5 years old, is the heavy man. The others are from five to nine, Smiley, of course, excepted. This sweet little company have just made a photoplay entitled "Buster's Dream," which will doubtless be a success.

Lubin's Rough Riding Kiddies.

PICTURES NOW HAVE VAUDEVILLE HOUSE.

The Bijou Theater, of Racine, Wis., has closed its doors to vaudeville and, after it has been thoroughly renovated and re-decorated, Mr. Frank W. Jenks, an experienced theatrical man, will open the place as a first-class moving picture house. Mr. Jenks is reported as having an eye on the educational picture and on Lyman Howe's travelogues. The admission price will be five cents.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S GRATITUDE" (Essanay).

This production is unquestionably one of the finest cf this great Western series originated and produced by Mr. G. M. Anderson, world famous throughout two hemispheres for his character creation of "Broncho Billy." The plot is unique, strikingly original and grippingly portrayed.

Dan Hart, a worthless good-for-nothing, takes the wedding ring from his wife's finger to pawn, and spends the money for drink. Leaving a note saying he has forfeited all claim to her as his wife, Mrs. Hart takes her little girl and departs for the West. A year later she is a Montana school-mistress and happy with her work. One evening, as she is washing the supper dishes, Broncho Billy, a hunted outlaw, takes refuge in her abode. Pitying him, Mrs. Hart bandages his wounded arm and gives him supper and protection for the night. Broncho and the little child are soon fast friends and next morning, when Mrs. Hart starts for the school-house, he departs with a heart full of gratitude for her kindness. That afternoon, Hart turns up unexpectedly, demands she come back to him and, when she scornfully refuses, takes the little one and escapes on the stagecoach. An hour later the stage is held up by Broncho, who recognizes the child in Hart's arms, demands to know where he is taking her and, when he refuses to explain, forces him to give her up and allows the stage to drive on unmolested. Outside the frantic mother's home, Broncho sends the child in with a note, then suddenly is surrounded by the sheriff's posse and led away to jail. Overjoyed at her baby's return, Mrs. Hart reads the note, which says Broncho is coming back some day to look her up and for her to kiss the "kid" for him. With a prayer in her heart she resolves to wait his return.

Scene from "Broncho Billy's Gratitude" (Essanay).

Mr. Anderson, as always, is splendid as Broncho, and Miss Vedah Bertram plays the wife with deep feeling and fine appreciation of the many opportunities afforded. The child is portrayed by a wonderful little actress, whose ability is marvelous. Brinsley Shaw is the worthless husband, and makes the most of this thankless part.

The production abounds in beautiful scenic studies throughout. The photography deserves the highest praise for splendid uniform quality. The film is booked for release Tuesday, June 18th.

THE TEARS O' PEGGY (Rex).

Marion Leonard, in a farce-comedy role, is not only a surprise but a success. In "The Tears o' Peggy" she does a squalling part that is certainly laughable and clever. Miss Leonard has usually given us portrayals of the American girl, whose expression of countenance lies mostly in the eyes. It is rather difficult to imagine Marion Leonard screwing her face up into a knot, and otherwise distorting her classic features into the mask of comedy, but now that she has done it, it can be said that she will lose none of her dignity as a leading woman. The real fact is that such a performance is a touch of nature that will bring her somewhat closer to her many admirers.

Peggy is a willful miss; the daughter of a willful father. Father has been able to pick many flaws in a certain young man that Peggy thinks is flawless. Therefore Peggy and father disagree and both being wilful, the disagreement is very strenuous, and the result is that the young man is ordered out of the house by the old gentleman, and ordered to remain in the house by Peggy. Exit young gentleman.

Just for that Peggy determines that she will cry herself to death, or until her stern parent yields to her desires, and thereafter she begins her tyranny of tears. Whenever the old man comes around she "boo-hoos" from the bottom of her heart. Whenever he is within hearing he hears her spurious sobs. The servants in the house are let into the secret and they go on a sympathetic strike. Peggy gets sympathy from all quarters while the father gets nothing but abuse. Life is beginning to be a great burden, when it suddenly comes to him that he is being made fun of. The humor of the situation strikes the old man in the right spot and he gives in very gracefully.

This is a comedy that will surely make people laugh. The unaccustomed sight of Marion Leonard doing facial distortion in itself will be a hilarious change, but the story by itself is full of laughs. It will make a good Saturday night comedy-booster.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Ralph Ince has been advanced into the ranks of photoplay directors. Besides being a fine character actor and a master in the art of makeup, Ralph is a picture maker by nature. Any man who can produce good pictures on paper is qualified to produce them on celluloid, especially if he happens to know a lot about acting at the same time.

Our old friend Bill Power is down at the Vitagraph plant with his four educated elephants. The "bulls" are doing some wonderful stuff as everyone will soon see when the pictures come out. It's been some years since we trouped with Willie and his two-tailed children, back in the old sawdust days. And my! How the children have grown. He's got one we never saw before, a little girl elephant that hasn't been born very long. This youngster will be the biggest kind of a hit in pictures. They do say that the Vitagraph is paying Mr. Power $10,000 for a six weeks' engagement.

Mr. James Young has been appointed a Vitagraph photoplay director, alternating the work with frequent appearances before the camera. Besides being one of the most aesthetic of men, Mr. Young is a scholarly actor and his accomplishments in that direction go far toward giving his pictures and appearances a velvet-like finish. At all times he is the artist rather than the noisy prompter. His successful appearances as a principal in many high-class Broadway productions was what actuated the Vitagraph Company to secure him.

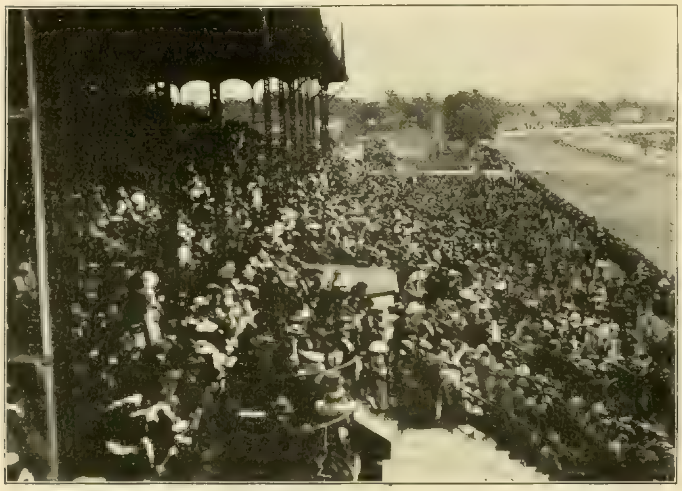
"DERBY DAY AT CHURCHILL DOWNS" (Essanay).

The life of a Kentucky race-horse, from the stock farm to the sensational dash under the wire, is shown in this highly entertaining and fascinating subject, and is undoubtedly one of the finest releases of the month.

The film starts with many excellent views of the mares, their colts and speedy yearlings out for the daily recreation, and introduces three famous sires, Sir Alvescot, Sempronius and Sir Huon. The bedtime routine is gone through with, and the thoroughbreds bid us good-night from their spacious stalls. Next we are transported to the race-course and acquainted with the morning activities around the stables, the stable boys at play and grooming the racers for the track. Billy Butters, the track mascot, is next introduced, and proves to be a highly interesting type of the genus "goat." Getting the track in shape for the great race, and the schooling of the youngsters at the barrier are shown, and the Derby is at hand. The great Kentucky Derby, held recently at Louisville, was admirably filmed by the Essanay Company, and scenes of the parkway for autos, the paddock, the jockeys' headquarters and the enormous crowds are vividly depicted. Next we are shown the Derby riders on their mounts, the call to the post, the parade past the cheering stands, the jockeying at the barrier and at last "They're off!" Sensational scenes of the great race, photographed with long-range lenses, follow, showing the thoroughbreds in their mad dash around the course, with the rousing finish neck and neck under the wire. The wonderful three-year-old, Worth, with the triumphant jockey, in splendid views, complete as thrilling and absorbing a racing picture as has ever been released.



Scene from "Derby Day at Churchill Downs" (Essanay).

The production is a sure-fire feature in every way, and will arouse the sporting blood of all lovers of superb horses. The scenes of the actual Derby race are complete in every detail, and follow the contestants throughout the entire course in sensational style until the final dash under the wire. The photography is a triumph of artistic expertness, and abounds with delightful tonal-values of completest perfection.

The production is booked for release Friday, June 21st.

"LIFE IN THE OHIO PENITENTIARY."

Convict life in the Ohio Penitentiary is the latest production of the America's Feature Film Company. The film is an educational subject and does not abound in either morbid sensationalism or melodramatic romance. It portrays in detail the daily routine of the life of those unfortunates, who have through their lawlessness brought upon themselves either a life or a number of years in penal servitude.

The pictures were obtained through the courtesy of Warden T. H. B. Jones. He granted the request in the hope that all who see them would be profited by such a presentation.

At the opening the picture demands the closest attention, the first scene being the guard room—the inlet to imprisonment and the outlet to freedom. This is immediately followed by the Bertillon room, where a photograph and the different dimensions of the prisoner are taken and recorded to the minutest details. The prisoner, thenceforward, is known only by number and not by name. He next goes to the convict barber for the customary head shave and, after being given his uniform (stripes are not worn in this prison except by unruly prisoners), he settles down to the grim reality of convict life.

Thus far, the pictures are no different than could be made in any other penitentiary. As they progress, however, a wide difference becomes apparent. The Ohio system educates and elevates the convict to such a degree that, once he leaves, it is seldom that he returns to any prison.

The night school views follow. A view of the antiquated Bolt shop, in which the unfair contract labor system was in vogue, is given. This system has long since been abolished. Painting the standpipe of the prison, a very dangerous task, is next shown. The prisoner who performs this each year is given his freedom.

The opening of the second reel shows the convicts at work on various improvements, which are necessary around the prison. This is followed by the postoffice, where the mail is opened and examined before being delivered. Next are seen the old and new bankers' row; the modern cell house which has just been completed; the 1861 cell block, where Confederate prisoners were confined during the Civil War; the cell occupied by the Confederate General Morgan, also the cell through which he and his men escaped; the carpenter shop; the bull pen, where all wagons leaving or entering are carefully searched; the dining-room, showing the way food is distributed; the kitchen, and the bakery.

The third reel opens with the cripples going to the hospital, and is followed by the interior of the hospital and the operating room. The next scene shows how prisoners are arrested for another offense, just as they are leaving, after serving one term. The old gallows, which has not been used since 1896, and the electric chair are next seen.

In this prison the system of educating and rewarding for merit prevails throughout, and there is no other in existence where the prisoners are treated with such humane consideration.

Its success has become a topic of general conversation and for this reason the pictures will be of interest to all. The exterior photography is clear and shows fine definition, while the interior views are also good, taking into consideration the difficulties encountered because of the light conditions.

MISS HELEN LYNN.

Miss Helen Lynn, who has previously been connected with one of the best film companies in this country, has been engaged as leading lady for the Diamond Film Company, a new and enterprising concern operating in their temporary studio at Woodside, L. I. Piquant and beautiful, Miss Lynn is the perfect type for motion pictures; coupled with this is a capacity for emotional expression rarely seen in so young an actress.

Some of the Characters in "Written in Blood" (Gaumont).

GAUMONT JULY 4th SUBJECT.

The Gaumont Company announces for its July 4th release "Written in Blood," a two-reel production that has been judiciously reduced to its present size from three thousand six hundred feet. This play is from the pen of the eminent French litterateur Lucius Danzigeux, who has seen some half dozen of his plays successfully produced by the National Academy of France. This institution is now in possession of the contract with the signature of Leon Gaumont attached to it, which gives to the latter the privilege of producing "Written in Blood" in film before it appears in Paris on the stage.

This July 4th release is a war story from beginning to end. It throbs and pulsates with the horror and terror of battle conflict. With it is woven a story of treachery, intrigue and unscrupulousness that compels the attention.

Scene from "Written in Blood" (Gaumont).

The dramatized version of "Written in Blood" is to be shown at one of the Paris theaters in the early part of November coming. There have been many instances within the past year of successful stage plays being secondarily submitted to the photoplay artist. As examples of this, one can cite: "The Power Behind the Throne," "Tale of Two Cities," Homer's "Odyssey," "Pilgrim's Progress," "Camille," "Sans Gene," but this is the first time that a play which is assured of success in the dramatized form in the Continental theater is to be first submitted to motion picture photography. The result of the influence that the picture will have on the play itself is one of much speculation, and the European papers and trade publications have devoted column after column to it.

Power's new equipment No. 6A is already receiving recognition, the new Biograph studio in the Bronx having installed the machine.

FILMING INTERNATIONAL AUTO RACES.

The Indianapolis Calcium Light and Film Company Puts Out Two Stirring Reels.

The international automobile race at the Indianapolis Speedway on May 30 was successfully filmed by the Indianapolis Calcium Light and Film Company, the guiding genius of which is William N. Swain. Mr. Swain, in company with B. E. Clements, who is to be the sole distributor for the United States, gave a private exhibition of the pictures at the Broadway Theater just before the films were placed on the market. The many interesting and exciting happenings of this great automobile day were compressed into two reels.

Eight camera men were stationed at strategic points about the two-and-a-half-mile course. Watching the start of twenty-six cars were eighty-five thousand people. If any of these were gathered to witness the distressing disasters that too frequently mar these great race meets they must have been disappointed. There were only four mishaps, none of them serious. Of the second of these the camera was fairly on the machine when it limped along the track and then off. The third smash was when car No. 23 collided with a concrete wall. The fourth was pictured in the results to Burman's machine, in which the noted driver of that car had a narrow escape.

The pictures open showing the racers lining up in front of the camera, introducing the drivers to a throng that eventually will many times outnumber those gathered on the speedway.

No time is wasted on the get-away, the cars crowding together and blanketed in clouds of dust. Just after the machines have been separated by several turns of the course there is one unusually fine picture of five cars abreast racing around a turn with the alignment and uniformity of so many trained soldiers. Nothing better than this one scene could demonstrate the facilities of the speedway for providing a spectacle.

One of the scenes perhaps will always outrank all other hard-luck classics—for surely when a man has driven 495 out of the prescribed 500 miles, breaking all records, is leading his nearest competitor by ten miles, and then have his engine go dead, he is entitled to the peculiar honor of the premier hard-luck man. That five miles cost Ralph De Palma $35,000 cash. The camera shows him pushing his car along the track by hand in a desperate effort to finish.

The pictures are not all, however, of such a depressing character as this. There is a bit of comedy introduced which is sure to relieve the tension of an audience and make a lot of laughter as well. Following the title "The Speed Bug's Dream" there are some samples of racing automobiles that would make a blue streak hide its diminished head. Over a mile straightaway the specks travel so fast they can scarcely be seen. It is accelerated motion—the trick of the camera. When the cars resume normal speed of seventy, eighty or ninety miles an hour they seem to be going slow!

The photography in both reels is clear, atmospheric conditions having been especially favorable. This is demonstrated in the panoramic views of the great crowds on the extensive grounds.

"THE HOLY CITY" (Eclair).

It is a daring task which has been taken up by the Eclair Company, in their Fort Lee studio, to present a Passion play based on an American theme, treating the delicate subject of the Gospel story in such a way as not to offend the religion of the people.

That it has been well done is the frank criticism of the members of the clergy who have already witnessed the early projections—the film itself will not be released until June 27.

The story is simplicity itself, and by its directness makes the most profound appeal. The theme is founded upon the distant strains of the popular song, "The Holy City," or "Jerusalem," as it is popularly known, heard by a clergyman as he devoutly pores over his testament in his study. As he stops, to listen, the vision of that glorious birthplace of our religion appears to him—Jerusalem the Eternal, rising from the sea of memories and thoughts.

In his vision the clergyman beholds the series of wonderful incidents of the Gospel story, without any of those details which would offend the most devout. The scene in the Temple, the bartering of the Orientals and the inspiring miracles, the healing of the sick, the paralyzed and the blind, the blessing of the little children, the prayers in the rocky fastnesses, the preachments in the woodlands, the addresses to the multitudes, the Sermon on the Mount, the entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday—all these are shown vividly, with more than one hundred actors in the scenes.

The various scenes of this great two-reel production were built up on the great paintings by early masters. Added to this superb foundation for grouping the lighting and scenic backgrounds and the vitality of movement, Eclair has produced a masterpiece of modern picture art.

The director of the company, in answer to the query as to possible resentment by some of the church people. declared:

"In ancient times the greatest art was that of the Biblical story. These pictures were sold by the artists, and to-day they are the greatest heirlooms of the world of art, as well as religion. These ancient artists worked, in a sense, commercially—and yet they gave to their work a religious feeling, a reverence and a dramatic feeling, which we believe we have shown in the treatment of this wonderful subject."

STORIES OF CHILDREN.

Entertaining Split-Reel Subjects to be Released by the Powers Motion Picture Company.

"Their One Day's Work," a unique and pretty child story soon to be released by the Powers Motion Picture Company, is cleverly conceived and admirably acted. Three tramps happen in a neighborhood just as the grandfather of a little girl is grief-stricken through the loss of his horse, which has been taken by the sheriff to satisfy a debt. He is plowing a field when the unwelcome visit is made and his farming operations are rudely halted. The child shares the anguish of the old man and sobs bitterly. Wandering away she comes upon some tramps and they sympathize with her and try in every way to cheer her up a bit. One of them gets down on all fours and asks her to ride on his back. This suggests a thought and she tells them about the unplowed field and the loss of the farm horse. The tourists confer and then act. They go to the field, harness themselves to the plow, and turn over the earth until the last furrow is plowed, although they are ready to drop from exhaustion. They receive the thanks of the girl and a hearty meal and leave. The grandfather, while overjoyed to find his field plowed, is in a quandary until the little girl explains. A very pretty story.

On the same reel is "The Helping Hand," another story in which a child starts out to do deeds of kindness and records the acts in a book furnished by the minister. She places fly-paper on the robe of her sleeping father, gives the hat and top coat of her sister's young man to a ragged tramp and then liberates a cage full of mice that have been caught, recording three very humane acts. A policeman is summoned to find the missing clothing, the tramp is arrested and the father has an exciting experience with the fly-paper just as the mice are creating a panic in a parlor filled with women. The girl explains everything and is in disfavor with everyone except the minister, who commends her on her kindness of heart, although her acts have caused considerable commotion in the household.

Power's new equipment No. 6A, with motor drive, has been approved by New York City through the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity.

"THE LITTLE BRIDE OF HEAVEN" (Edison).

A touching little comedy-drama is portrayed by the Edison players under the title, "The Little Bride of Heaven," scheduled for release on June 25th. Little Carmelita, about to be confirmed lacks a suitable dress for the occasion. Her mother is very poor and unable to buy the confirmation gown. Carmelita is intensely devout and has great faith in the power of the Virgin Mary to supply her wants. While earnestly praying for the gown, she is discovered by a Polish woman who is a neighbor. Among the family keepsakes of the Polish woman is a confirmation gown of her own child long since passed away. With tears of recollection, the kind hearted woman takes the gown from its hiding place, and places it where little Carmelita will find it—near the household shrine. Thus Carmelita is enabled to take her place at the head of the class of communion, her heart full of faith in the efficacy of the blessed Virgin. It is a pretty little story told with great feeling and reverence.

HECTOR DION RETURNS TO PICTURES.

After an absence from the photoplay field for a period of about three years, Mr. Hector Dion, one of the first photoplay favorites in the business has returned to the movies. Mr. Dion made his first camera appearances with the Biograph Co., and will be remembered by old exhibitors for his work in a play with Laura Burt, entitled "The Horse Thief." Mr. Dion will be best remembered by the old guard as the Vitagraph leading man in the days when Florence Turner first began to win renown. He appeared opposite her in such good old-timers as "The Mill Girl," "The Gypsy's Warning," "College Chums," etc. Mr. Dion has made a few appearances lately for the Reliance Company, and will probably accept terms to remain in stock.

FLICKERS.

F. W. Young, of Cedar Rapids, Ia., is in town looking up the feature film companies. Mr. Young has a new theater under construction in Fort Dodge, Ia., with a seating capacity of 550, which, when completed, will be one of the most up-to-date houses in the West. No expense is being spared in equipment. A ventilating system and the Mirror Screen are features of the new house.

"SUNDAY THANHOUSER" THE FIRST.

The "Sunday Thanhouser" is here! As the new third reel of the Thanhouser weekly output, it will be watched with interest. "The Farm and the Flat," a comedy, is the first picture on the new day. June 23rd is the first Sunday. The new Thanhouser comedian, Riley Chamberlin, gets a lot of laughs in the picture as a farmer. He is the owner of a pleasant country place that he wants to lease for the summer, which he would spend in the city. A city man, on the other hand, wants to lease his flat for the hot spell and flee to the country. Farmer and flat-dweller happen to "hear tell" of each other's situation; they promptly "swap" homes. But it doesn't work out right. The farmer got in bad with the new-fangled flat conveniences and the city man, jay-like, bought a stolen horse from a tramp and almost brought up in jail. The reel is a long laugh.

CALL FOR PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

We respectfully call your attention to the convention to be held in Pittsburgh on Monday and Tuesday, June 24th and 25th, by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Pennsylvania Branch No. 3.

The object of the convention is to elect new State officers and organize locals throughout the State and promote harmony and progress amongst the moving picture men and to weld them into one big organization.

Arrangements have been made at the Monongahela House for accommodations and headquarters, and preparations have been made for a large number of delegates.

The convention assembles at 10 a. m. Monday and continues throughout the day. Monday evening is given over to the social events.

Tuesday, 10 a. m., the election of officers takes place; at noon the H. J. Heinz Company tenders an elegant banquet at their huge plant.

A street parade back to headquarters follows, where the business of the organization is again taken up.

Tuesday night a boat excursion on the Monongahela, Ohio and Allegheny rivers winds up what we claim is going to be the biggest and best moving picture convention ever held.

HARRY E. REIFF,
Corresponding Secretary.

ECLAIR RELEASE DATE CHANGED.

Eclair's two-reel political allegorical picture entitled "The High Cost of Living" will be released on Tuesday, June 18, instead of on June 10th as was announced in our last week's issue. The synopsis of this picture will be found on page 1066 of our issue dated June 15.

"MEALS BY WEIGHT" (Majestic).

This is a forthcoming Majestic release that is certainly a scream. It embodies an original idea that is worked out thoroughly. A Dutchman conducting a two-cent coffee house, conceived a bright idea of solving the high cost of living to his own profit. He figured out where he could make more money selling meals by weight than a la carte. His method was to weigh each customer before and after eating, charging so much per pound for their gain in avoirdupois. The scheme worked beautifully until one of nature's essential economists, a hobo, came along and saw the sign advertising meals by weight. He put a big heavy paving stone under his coat and went in to eat. After the meal was over he was so light that the restaurant-keeper owed him money and, of course, he had to pay for it. Not being content with this good fortune, Weary Willie had to go back to the bums' boudoir and inform all his friends what a good thing he had found. They all filled their clothes with bricks, and proceeded at once to kill the goose that laid the golden eggs. It did not take long for the Dutchman to find out that there is no profit in selling meals by weight.

"SHENANDOAH" IN MOTION PICTURES.

Kalem Secures Exclusive Rights to Bronson Howard's Famous Play.

After several months of negotiations the Kalem Company has secured from the estate of the late Bronson Howard the exclusive motion picture dramatic rights to his celebrated Civil War drama, "Shenandoah." Of the many military plays which have been presented, none is better known than this gripping drama of the 60's. Kalem is to make a feature multiple reel production of "Shenandoah," and this company's remarkable success in staging spectacular military plays assures exhibitors that the Bronson Howard drama will prove an exceptional headliner.

"THE SINS OF OTHERS."

This is an Italian love story, photographed amid the natural scenery of a most glorious country. It tells of the love of a young Italian nobleman, Armand de Sartines, for a young girl of education and refinement, though not of the nobility. Armand's family strenuously objects to the courtship on account of the questionable character of Renée, Marguerite's mother.

The girl learns of her mother's reputation and attempts to commit suicide, but is prevented by Armand's father, who has been persuaded to visit her. This convinces the old Marquise of her honesty, and he gives his consent to the marriage.

Armand's sister, though married, entertains a lover during the absence of her husband, but, unknown to her brother and family, she manages, with the aid of a chauffeur, to fasten suspicion upon Armand's wife, and she is cast off by an irate husband. Later the chauffeur repents upon seeing the distress of Marguerite, who has been reduced to poverty, and he confesses, whereupon Marguerite is restored to her rightful position in the family. Released by the International Film Traders.

GREATEST OF ALL WILD ANIMAL PICTURES.

The Selig Polyscope Company has announced its intention of releasing, sometime in the very near future, "Kings of the Forest," which is without a doubt the most daring and elaborate wild animal picture ever produced by any company. The story deals with the wanderings of a lost child through the jungle country. In producing this picture the Selig Company used practically every cat animal that it owns. Every facility of the vast Selig Animal Farm was turned over to the producing department of the Los Angeles Studio and Mr. W. N. Selig gave out word that no expense was to be spared in making this picture as thrilling and elaborate as possible.

UNIVERSAL COMPANY WILL HAVE HOUSE ORGAN.

Announcement is made by the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., one of the factions of the now defunct Sales Company, that it will issue a house organ to be known as the "Universal Weekly," which will contain information regarding those pictures released by the several companies allied with the Universal. In furthering this project, "Film Fancies," the Bison booklet, and "The Implet," a circular issued by the Imp Company, will be merged in the new organ. H. J. Streyckmans and Thomas Bedding will be in charge of the new enterprise.

AMERICAN TO RELEASE THREE A WEEK.

Beginning Wednesday, July 3, the American Film Manufacturing Company will release three instead of two Western subjects. The new addition is the result of the steady, consistent demand for more Western subjects which seem to be general among independent exchanges.

The American has placed a new company in the field, whose every effort will be bent toward the production of the highest possible grade of out-of-door Cowboy, Indian and Mining pictures.

"CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT"

COMING! THREE REELS COMING!

This is the most thrilling and sensational subject ever produced, in which a thousand Indians and a thousand soldiers take part in a re-enactment of the most tragic and heroic incident in the nation's history. The events leading up to the Custer massacre are accurately shown, and the sensational fight of Gen. Custer, showing his last stand and the entire annihilation of his command. The public will go wild over this subject and pack every theater that runs it. Don't delay in arranging for booking with your exchange. You cannot afford to fail to run this picture.

"101"-BISON HEADLINERS-"101"

"HIS PUNISHMENT"

1 REEL Released June 18 1 REEL

A lieutenant carries on a clandestine love affair with an Indian maid. He is promoted and transferred to a distant fort where he marries the daughter of an officer. Twenty years later the daughter of the Indian girl whose mother died of a broken heart wreaks a terrible vengeance on him. The entire "101" Bison company is seen in this picture, which depicts thrilling battle scenes.

ON THE WARPATH

2 REELS Released June 22 2 REELS

The Yuma Indians make peace with the government and are attacked by their former allies, the Apaches. A Yuma warrior, in a sensational dash, reaches the fort and secures the assistance of the soldiers, who plunge into the raging battle and save the Yumas from death. A tremendous cast is used in this subject.

DEMAND 3 IMPS EVERY WEEK

IMP . . . COMING!

"THE DIVIDING LINE"

(Copyright, 1912, Universal F. M. Co.)

A one-thousand-foot feature Imp. Love and war form the theme. The staging is great, the acting masterly, the photography perfect. This film will be released Monday, June 24th. See that you get it.

IMP . . . COMING!

"A CHILD'S INFLUENCE"

(Copyright, 1912, Universal F. M. Co.)

Through the perfidy of a chum a mother is induced to leave her home and family. Mother love, at a crucial moment, following an accident to her child, awakens within her the sense of duty and she returns. It is replete with thrilling situations and most brilliantly enacted. King Baggott appears in the stellar role.

IMP . . . COMING!

"HIS OTHER SELF"

(Copyright, 1912, Universal F. M. Co.)

Here's something unique! King Baggott appears in a dual role, as the hero and as the hero's other self—AT THE SAME TIME. It will give your patrons something to talk about, wondering how in blazes the Imp did it! Don't tell them! Keep it a dark secret! Read the synopsis elsewhere in this issue and then demand "His Other Self" every day until you get it.

IMP . . . COMING!

"PORTUGUESE JOE"

(Copyright, 1912, Universal F. M. Co.)

A simple little comedy taken from Edwin A. Locke's dialect poem of the same title. Released June 29th (Saturday) on the same split reel as "His Other Self."

TO SCENARIO WRITERS

The Powers Motion Picture Company wishes to purchase the Highest Class of Photoplays

Obtainable—stories of American Life-Dramas and Comedies. To this end we will inaugurate a prize contest and offer the following inducement to stimulate writers to better effort:

First prize	$100.00	Third......	50.00
Second	75.00	Fourth.....	25.00

CONDITIONS OF CONTEST:

All manuscripts must be typewritten and accompanied by return postage or self addressed envelope.

All scripts must be addressed to the scenario department and labeled, "Contest." Otherwise they will be treated as regular contributions.

The stories will be read and passed upon by a committee composed of moving picture experts. All contributions considered available will be purchased. The names of successful authors will be placed on the films.

In the future we will pay the highest prices for scenarios commensurate with their worth.

The contest is now open and will close July 15, 1912, and all manuscripts in competition will be held until July 20, 1912.

Address all communications regarding this contest to the scenario department.

A MINUTE AGO

we looked up the word "Gem" in the dictionary. Not that we didn't know what the word meant before, or how much it will soon mean to the trade, but—we did it anyhow! Mr. Webster, the man in the dictionary business, defined the word as

A JEWEL............................(they'll sparkle with life).
A PRECIOUS STONE...................(leave none unturned.)
ANY PERFECT OBJECT.................(Mr. Webster was some prophet).

Our own idea of the word is that after the folks see "The Princess of Lorraine" Gem and Jam will be as correlative as Bryan and defeat.

YOU CAN'T REALIZE

what a giant parcel of effort and energy Mr. George O. Nicholls is contributing to the Gem productions in a sincere endeavor to beat his own flattering record; but YOU CAN REALIZE on the result of it!

THE GIRL AND THE MAYOR (June 25).—Riot rages unconfined; the suffragettes hold an indignation meeting, and are not at all silenced by the appearance of the mayor at the head of a squad of police. Suddenly, a well aimed stone flies from the ranks of the turbulent ladies, striking the mayor on the forehead.

Poor little Louisa is seen to throw the fatal missile, and is promptly arrested and carried off to the official residence before being taken to prison. She timidly admits the deed, but claims she did not throw the stone: "It flew out of my hand."

It soon develops that her talents are not confined to throwing stones, however, for she also proves a capable nurse, and wins the injured official's commendation with her care and attention. Indeed, she makes such a good impression that the mayor engages her as his stenographer.

Everything is going nicely, when suddenly she is forced to resign her position in order to care for her invalid aunt. The official engages a new typist, but the latter proves very unsatisfactory, and he longs for the charming Louisa again.

Finally, in desperation, he goes to see her, and insists upon return. She accepts the offer, and a little later, strange to relate; accepts his offer of marriage.

THE WANDERING MINSTREL (June 29).—Old Jacques, a veritable patriarch among street musicians, notices a pretty but ill-clad girl subjected to all manner of insults, while endeavoring to sell papers in the cafe. Greatly incensed, he goes to her assistance. After rescuing her from her tormentors, he learns that she has no home, and insists upon taking her under his protection.

In his attic room he patiently instructs her to play the violin, and together they go forth daily to earn a scant living. They work cheerfully in this manner until one day the pretty face of the girl attracts the attention of a young man, who tries to persuade her to run away and marry him. This she finally agrees to do, leaving old Jacques to find consolation in his music.

The marriage does not prove happy for very long, however, and one day the poor girl finds herself deserted, and utterly in want. In her despair she reluctantly returns to her former benefactor. Old Jacques understands her misery, and tenderly receives her back to share his humble abode. He forgives and forgets her past weakness, and together they enter upon a new and happier existence.

ECLIPSE.

THE MUSIC HALL SINGER (June 26).—Helene, a charming young woman, possesses a beautiful voice, and after a long, hard struggle, succeeds in making a name for herself at the music hall.

Not long afterward she is engaged at the opera, and makes her debut in "Carmen," taking the role of the popular Spanish heroine. Her success is instantaneous, and her fame spreads so rapidly that she soon becomes the popular toast of the town.

Flushed with her good fortune, she begins to despise her husband, a poor artist, and decides to leave him. The unfortunate fellow seeks employment without avail, until, after a long search, he is forced to accept a position as super in the opera in which his wife is the star.

In the midst of the brilliant performance a sudden fire breaks out on the stage, causing everyone to flee in terror. In trying to escape Helene is overcome by the smoke and faints to the floor, where she is found by her husband and carried to safety.

Helene soon recovers, but the injuries sustained during the rescue prove too much for her husband, who not long afterward expires in a hospital.

All the honors and adulation have a taste of bitterness now, for she realizes that the man she despised really gave his life for her.

ESSANAY.

BILLY AND THE BUTLER (June 25).—Billy McGrath is arrested one morning for speeding and taken to the police court. He pays his fine and is about to depart when he comes face to face with a man being led in handcuffed by an officer. Billy sizes the fellow up and leaves. The handcuffed man is really James Thornton, alias "Butler Jim," an English crook whose specialty is robbing his employers while serving as butler in their houses. Later Billy is a guest at a week end house party given by his friend Lawton. On arriving he is talking with Lawton, when the butler passes through the room. It is Thornton. Billy tries to remember where he has seen the man, but cannot place him. With a confederate, Thornton now plans to rob the house while the guests are at dinner. Coming from his room, Billy sees the two leaving one of the rooms with stolen jewelry in their hands. He endeavors to capture them, but is overpowered and locked in the bathroom. He manages to escape by knocking the hingepins from the door, pursues the crooks out across the lawn, and is putting up a brave fight to keep them from escaping in an auto when an officer arrives. Thornton cleverly explains that Billy is a crook, and the puzzled officer puts McGrath in handcuffs in spite of his vigorous protests, allowing the real crooks to escape in their auto. Once Lawton and the guests are summoned Billy is identified, the thieves pursued in another auto and captured after a revolver battle. Meanwhile Billy is still handcuffed back at the Lawton residence, and is in misery until the police get back and liberate him. The stolen loot is restored to Lawton and Billy is once again the hero of the hour.

A GUARDIAN'S LUCK (June 27).—Moxie Mickleberry has a pretty ward, Polly. One day Moxie, who is quite aged, receives a letter from his lawyer advising that if Polly should ever marry he will have to replace her fortune, which, in his present financial straits, he would be unable to do. The lawyer advises him to marry Polly himself and thus save embarrassment. Moxie thinks it a scheme and determines to carry it through. In the meantime his sister's two children come to spend the day and Moxie has the time of his life keeping them out of mischief. They shoot him full of arrows, intended for a target set up in the library, and damage the neighbors' clothes hung out on the line in the yard. Moxie finally gets a chance and writes Polly a letter telling of his undying love and that he is determined to win her for his wife. Of course Polly has a nice young sweetheart and the two plan to fool the old guardian and cure him of his folly. Polly writes a note saying he must interview her and pour out his love and, if at the end of ten minutes she does not turn and speak, he will know silence means consent. Then they rig up a statue in Polly's clothes and place it in the parlor, light the fire in the grate to help make it all the warmer for him and hide to await the outcome. Meanwhile, the children load the fireplace with a stuffed target, arrows, bows, etc., and Moxie is pleading his cause to the veiled statue when a volume of smoke overwhelms him. He investigates, dirties himself frightfully pulling the scorching stuff from the grate, discovers the deception of the statue, smashes it angrily on the floor, is arrested by a cop who thinks the house is on fire, and the mix-up culminates at the minister's house where Polly and her beau are being married. Moxie realizes he is stung, gives them his sooty blessing and collapses in the arms of the law.

SPRINGING A SURPRISE (June 28).—Young Billy Borman has an old uncle who has turned him out of the house when he foolishly takes unto himself a lovely wife. A year later Billy and wifie have a bouncing baby boy and Billy writes Uncle Missimer begging him to relent and take them back into the fold. Uncle writes back saying he can never return until he rids himself of everything that "wears a skirt." Billy now hits upon two schemes to bring uncle to terms. He inserts an ad in the paper, signed with Missimer's name, saying a rich bachelor wants a wife to share his fortune and affections. Then he takes his baby, leaves it on uncle's doorstep, rings the bell and skips. Knowing nothing of the baby's real identity, Missimer is in despair, inserts an ad in the paper and offers $25 reward to anyone who will adopt it. Next morning he is beseiged by an army of women who have come in answer to the ad Billy put in the paper. Uncle thinks they wish to take the baby, and has a terrible time in the mixup that follows. However, one pretty girl strikes Missimer's fancy; he manages to get rid of the rest, then is making violent love to her when Billy rushes in and demands to know what uncle means by making love to his wife! Missimer is dumbfounded, but is knocked out entirely when Billy and wife explain that the baby is their own. Uncle is soon won over, takes the crowing tot in his arms with delight, while Billy and his wife rejoice at the happy outcome of their plan.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE INDIAN MAID (June 29).—Bart McGrew, a rascally schemer, endeavors to secure an old Indian chief's signature to a deed that will give him thousands of acres of valuable land owned by the tribe. Laughing Fawn, the chief's beautiful daughter, suspects Bart of treachery and takes her father away before he signs. Later McGrew finds the old chief in the town saloon trying to buy whiskey, which is refused him. McGrew secures a bottle of liquor, gets the Indian in the back room, plies him with the firey stuff until he is intoxicated, then endeavors to secure his signature to the paper. Laughing Fawn comes in search of her father, realizes the situation, tears up the deed and is seized by the infuriated ruffian. Her screams attract the attention of Broncho Billy, who is playing cards in the outer room. He rushes in, covers McGrew with his six-shooter, sends Laughing Fawn and her father away, warns McGrew to stop his evil scheme and backs out the door. Burning with revenge, McGrew follows Broncho to his cabin and is about to kill him through the open window, when he in turn is slain by a shot from Laughing Fawn's revolver. Broncho learns the Indian maid has saved his life, discharges a shell in McGrew's gun, also one in his own, and when the Sheriff arrives, explains McGrew was killed in self-defense. The sheriff examines the guns, is convinced Broncho tells the truth, and departs with the body, leaving Broncho and Laughing Fawn standing watching them out of sight down the dusty trail.

EDISON.

THE LITTLE BRIDE OF HEAVEN (June 25).—Little Carmelita and her mother are extremely poor, so poor that, as the time approaches for her to take her first communion, there is no money to buy clothes. She has studied hard, looking forward to this important event in her life with great joy, and is therefore heartbroken when she learns that it is impossible to procure the clothes. She feels her position keenly, especially as several of her little friends visit her and display their pretty white dresses, etc. They ask to see her clothes too, but she is forced to admit that she has none and bursts out crying. Her faith is terribly shaken and throwing her catechism at the feet of the Virgin she rushes from the house.

Outside she meets Pharos, a newsboy, who tells her of a wigmaker who has admired her beautiful hair and is willing to pay her six dollars for it. Carmelita sees her opportunity to have her dress after all and goes to the wigmaker's, where her beautiful tresses are cut and she is the happy possessor of six dollars. Emerging from the shop she faces Pharos, who stares at her horror-struck and hurries away. Carmelita catches sight of herself in the window. She too is frightened at the change in her appearance and hurries home.

Here she finds the owner of the tenement threatening to eject her mother unless the two months' rent is paid immediately. Carmelita, after a struggle, sacrifices the money for her dress and pays the rent. Her mother demanding the source of the money, discovers Carmelita's shorn head and realizing what the sacrifice must have cost her, gently folds her in her arms. Mrs. Litinsky, a neighbor, who has witnessed the scene now steals softly out of the room leaving mother and daughter alone. Going to her own home she gets from a trunk in the cellar a little white dress, veil, wreath, slippers, etc., in which her own dead child Rachel had been confirmed.

Meantime Carmelita and her mother burn a candle and offer a prayer to the Holy Mother and with peace in their hearts go out together. Mrs. Litinsky, who has been watching for their going, now slips upstairs and laying Rachel's white clothes before the little altar, quietly slips out.

Carmelita finds them there when she returns. Her surprise quickly turns to joy, for surely the Holy Mother had heard her prayer and performed this miracle.

Next Sunday, at the head of the procession Carmelita walked with a grateful heart and an inspired soul for, of all the little brides of Heaven, her faith was strongest.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE POLICE, TROOP "B" (June 26).—Here is a descriptive picture showing the vastness of the work required of the Pennsylvania State Police. The work is decidedly interesting, as it is out of the ordinary routine of police duty. An interesting scene of Troop "B" mounted on horseback is shown; the horses gallop and turn sometimes running abreast in a long line, swaying from right to left at the slightest touch of the rein.

There are various offenses for which arrest is liable: from illegal fishing and hunting to a dangerous arrest based upon an incident at Florence, Pa., showing the police entering the house under the fire of the fugitives and coming out with their men. Another requirement of the police is to fight forest fires. This scene shows the police with their equipment for such an occasion smothering a blaze which, if not handled promptly and skillfully, might have resulted in serious loss of life and money.

In obtaining interesting matter for this film the scenic portion was not neglected. Scenes on picturesque roadways, whirling streams and shady forests all add to the beauty, especially one of the mounted police passing the monument at Wyoming commemorating the Indian Massacre during the Revolutionary War.

THE WOODEN INDIAN (June 26).—Teddie Towns is in love with an attractive daughter of an old gentleman who runs a cigar store, but that worthy gentleman, having the protective instinct of a father, is very much against his daughter having a "steady," and, consequently, Ted is sternly ordered away from the store while having a little conversation with Grace, his sweetheart.

A wooden Indian, which stands in front of the store furnishes Ted with an idea and making up as an Indian he takes its place and in this way manages to see his sweetheart. The old man thinks so much of his sign that he brings it into the store every evening, thus Ted is given a chance to hide the wooden effigy and assume its office. Under these risky circumstances he makes love to Grace almost under the very nose of her sleepy old father.

All good things however must have an ending, so one night under these romantic conditions, Grace is sent out on an errand by her mother. The store remains empty for a few moments; a sneak thief enters and seeing apparently no one about, starts to pilfer the show cases. Ted's wit asserts itself. Forgetting his own position he wrestles with the thief. Help comes quickly and a policeman arrests the miscreant. Grace's father recognizes the manly worth in Teddie and finds no reason why he should not accept him for a son-in-law.

MASTER AND PUPIL (June 28).—The favorite pupil of an artist becomes incensed at his master's criticism of his work, and breaking away from him and from his daughter, to whom he is engaged, starts out to make a living for himself by means of his art. The little girl grieves for him, his work is refused by publishers and eventually an attic room and a crust of bread are all that keep him alive. Then an opportunity comes to make original drawings for a fine edition of Dickens' works, but his inexperience and illness overcome him and when his master, who cannot bear to see the little daughter grieve, climbs the garret stairs he finds the young man in a stupor upon the bed from exhaustion and the crude sketches upon the table. Out of the goodness of his heart the master toils through the long night, completes the work and leaves upon the table a set of original drawings which are perfect. And when in the morning the publisher's clerk comes, though he finds the young artist ill in bed, he finds the sketches done and takes them with him to the publisher. The young man not understanding why his work has been accepted, manages to crawl to the table and there finds a telltale cigar which his master had left by accident. In spite of his weakness, he stumbles down the stairs and to the publisher's office. There all his suspicions are verified; he sees his master's work. He runs to the studio of the old man, throws himself upon his knees before him, asking forgiveness. Of course forgiveness is forthcoming and of course the little daughter is glad to have him again.

Beside the story and the splendid acting the film gives an opportunity for Mr. Furniss to do some of his remarkable drawings before the eyes of the spectator and a number of his splendid pen pictures of Dickens' famous characters are shown in this way.

THE FATHER (June 29).—Henry Bent is the overworked head clerk in the office of William Price, a contractor. He is a valuable man to the concern but not being of an aggressive personality, has been kept on a small salary for many years.

At the start of the story the doctor tells him that his little daughter, who is almost an invalid, must be sent South if she is to live at all or to have any hope of regained health. On his low salary this is impossible and he goes to his employer asking for a raise. This is promptly refused although the latter cheerfully hands his daughter a hundred dollars for an expensive dog collar.

At this psychological period in Bent's career, a rival of Mr. Price offers him five hundred dollars for information concerning a certain bid which Price has made on a state contract. Being in terrible need he accepts the offer, goes to the office, copies the figures, carelessly losing a scrap of paper in so doing with his own writing upon it, and after giving the competitor the figures takes the five hundred dollars to send his child away. Of course when Price finds that he is underbid and discovers the scrap of paper he puts two and two together and goes to Bent's house. Bent tells him that he has been paying thirty dollars a week for a seventy-five-dollar man and denounces the injustice under which he has been patient so long. Before he can reply the little girl is brought into the room and Price then learns that he is supposed by her to have loaned the five hundred dollars to her father. A simple letter of thanks is then handed to him and makes him realize what the other man's daughter means to him. It requires but a few seconds' hesitation and then the better man within him comes out and he wishes her a pleasant journey and looking into Bent's eyes gives him to understand that things will be better for him in the future.

KALEM.

THE COLONEL'S ESCAPE (June 24).—Rhys Pryce, a soldier of fortune, finds James Boyd, a Mexican Custom officer, who has been thrown into a cave by a band of smugglers. A few days later Boyd receives word to intercept arms and ammunition that are being smuggled across the border into Mexico by the Insurrectos, whom Pryce has incited to fight for the freedom of their country. Pryce, being hard pressed by the Federals, seeks shelter in Boyds house. Boyd readily recognizes the fugitive as the man who befriended him while in distress, and in gratitude he helps Pryce to escape. Boyd's action, however, has been witnessed by a Federal spy, who reports the affair to the commanding officer. He is court-martialed and sentenced to be shot. Before the execution can take place, however, Boyd's sister rides with all speed to the Insurrecto camp and urges Pryce to save her brother. In answer to her entreaty, Pryce, at the head of a strong party of insurrectos, arrives just in time to save Boyd and defeat the Federals.

CAPTURED BY BEDOUINS (June 26).—Lieut. Greig, a blase young Englishman, becomes interested in Doris Barnett, a fair young American, and through her brother Jack secures an introduction. They meet again in Cairo, Egypt, where the lieutenant urges his suit for the hand of the fair American, but is rejected. Doris slips away at night to consult the Sphinx as to whether she has done right in refusing Lieut. Greig. She is seen by some prowling Bedouins and taken captive to their native village. The next morning her guide returns to demand a ransom.

The lieutenant, learning of Doris' plight, starts out alone to effect her rescue. He meets an Arab, and, overpowering him, takes his clothes. A burnt handkerchief serves as coloring for Greig's face, and in this disguise he proceeds to enter the Bedouin village. During the night he succeeds in bringing about Doris' escape. However, their departure is soon discovered and the Bedouins follow in pursuit. A running fight takes place in the desert and when Doris and the lieutenant are about to abandon hope, a rescue party arrives and puts the Bedouins to flight.

THE PENALTY OF INTEMPERANCE (June 28).—John comes home intoxicated and his brutal actions compel Kate to seek the protection of the law. He is arrested for cruelty and non-support and sent to the Island. His family becomes destitute, the young girl is sent to a charitable home and Kate and the baby to the hospital on the Island. Later, her health being partially restored, Kate works for her board that she may be near her baby. The previous privation, however, has been too much for the tender child. Its weakened body finally succumbs to the illness. John, who is a prisoner on the same island, learns of Kate's presence, and upon hearing of the child's death, is grief-stricken. He secures permission to see his child before the burial. The realization comes over John that he is to blame for all this sorrow and he determines to change his ways.

After the baby's death, Kate returns to the city and secures employment. Two months later John is liberated and solemnly promises his wife that he will lead a new life. Kate takes him to her heart and John secures work. When a year has passed we see the result of strict temperance and the fulfillment of John's promise to his wife—a happy home.

VITAGRAPH:

THE EXTENSION TABLE (June 24).—Mabel Moore and Ethel Brian, two young stenographers, are engaged. Mabel marries Herbert Jenkins, her employer, a wealthy man, and Ethel marries John Hayward, a young law clerk. Herbert and Mabel support a very pretentious establishment, while Ethel and John are located in a modest but comfortable little flat. Herbert is so absorbed in the making of money, and becomes so wealthy and socially popular, that Mabel finds herself very much neglected, and their love for each other grows colder and colder. Ethel and John, happy in their mutual interests, blessed with a family, find life one sweet dream. They are not burdened with money, but blessed with a wealth of children, until they have five little ones about their table. John works harder and more willingly, until he is received into the firm as a partner.

Mabel becomes more and more estranged from her husband. She calls to see Ethel and becomes one of her family as a boarder. While she is stopping with John and Ethel, a child is born to her. John invites Herbert to call at his home, not letting him know what has happened, or that Mabel is stopping at their home. Mrs. Hayward remains out of sight. Herbert is very much pleased with John's children, and takes an especial fancy to one bright little fellow, six weeks old. Mabel enters the room. Herbert is surprised to learn that the baby is their own, and Herbert and Mabel are reunited by the stronger union of fatherhood and motherhood.

WHEN ROSES WITHER (June 26).—After the death of her husband, Mrs. Bennett is left alone in the old farmhouse to dwell upon the memories and keepsakes of the past. Her son Howard, who went out into the world at an early age, now a man of wealth, residing in the city, is married to a woman of social prominence. He wants his mother to come to the city to live with him. She is loathe to leave. She takes particular pleasure in her little rose garden, in which are the graves of her husband and daughter.

Howard does everything possible to make her residence with his pleasant, but she does not seem to enter into the modern ideas of society. She grieves, and longs to be back in the quiet and hallowed surroundings of her own home. She gets possession of the key, which she had given to her son when she left the old farmhouse. Gathering her few belongings together, she leaves the mansion and makes her way back to her own domicile.

As she passes through her garden she finds the roses withered and pauses to shed a loving tear over the graves of her dear ones. She enters the old sitting-room, sits down to rest and meditate in sweet communion with her cherished memories. Opening her Bible, she finds between the pages the pressed roses, tokens of her husband's thought of her.

Her son discovers his mother's absence. He and his wife go to his mother's home, where they find her sitting in the old arm chair, with the open Bible before her, her finger pointing to the words: "And in this place again, they shall enter into My rest!" a smile upon her lips, gone to meet those who have gone before her.

PSEUDO SULTAN (June 28).—All are lost in a wreck off the coast of Persia, excepting John Bunnyhug. In an open boat he succeeds in reaching land, where he is captured and brought before the ruler of the country, who orders him to be kept a week and then beheaded. During John's imprisonment, the Sultan dies. His death throws the Sultana into a great grief, and a dervish priest is brought in to pacify her. With incantations and his mysterious art, he throws her into a trance, with the understanding that the first man she sees on awakening, is to be her future husband. Poor Bunnyhug is being brought before the regent, when he succeeds in snatching from the hands of his jailors, two swords, with which he cuts a wide swath, fleeing into the presence of the Sultana, who awakens and immediately falls into his arms, willing to be his and his alone. She makes him Sultan, and now finding himself in power, Bunnyhug determines to visit his harem. The Sultana insists upon accompanying him and when he attempts to embrace the haremites, she leads him into another part of the castle.

The jealous and plotting regent is determined to depose the Sultanas consort, by showing him to be a psuedo Sultan; in other words—a fake and a humbug. He tells Bunnyhug that unless he conforms to a test of endurance, climbing a step ladder of sharp-edged swords, and walking upon hot coals, the people of Persia will not accept him as their ruler. Bunnyhug removes his shoes, after seeing the feats performed by one of the natives, and attempts to repeat them himself, with dire results, lascerating and burning his feet so that he jumps and cries with pain, yelling for mercy. He is carried back to jail, disgraced and humiliated. Through the kindness of the Sultana, his sentence is commuted, and later, he manages to escape with his life, and with no desire to become a Sultan or pass through the same experiences.

AT THE END OF THE TRAIL (June 29).—With a warrant for the arrest of Manuel Lopes, a notorious Mexican horse thief, the sheriff strikes his trail. He finds the desperado out in the desert, prostrated by thirst. He revives him with water from his own canteen, and placing the handcuffs on him, puts him under arrest. After regaining his strength, the Mexican treacherously pretends to be weak. The sheriff, little suspecting an attack, is struck down by his prisoner. He is left to face the death from which he has just rescued his assailant. The Mexican takes the key from the prostrate man's pocket, and unlocking the handcuffs, places them upon the sheriff.

The brave officer, as soon as he regains his senses, resolves to stick to the end of the trail, and, wounded though he is, crawls manacled to the Mexican's house. Some cowboys, who see the Mexican on the sheriff's pony, follow him to his home, where his daughter, Mercedes, has given shelter to the sheriff. The Mexican reaches the house ahead of the others. His daughter tries to detract his attention from the room where the sheriff is hidden. He becomes suspicious, throws his daughter aside to enter the room, when the sheriff, with his manacled hands, manages to draw his revolver and faces the infuriated man. To prevent bloodshed, the daughter jumps between them just as they fire their guns. The shot from her father's pistol kills her. The door of the cabin is burst open, the cowboys enter and capture the Mexican, whom they take to jail. His daughter is laid to rest, saved from the disgrace of her father's imprisonment and death sentence.

LUBIN.

OVER THE DIVIDE (June 24).—Jim Burton, a young prospector, is out West trying to make a "strike," when he receives a telegram saying that his mother (his only relative), has died. Not having money enough for railroad fare to take him home, he believes he can get it by gambling, but he loses all. Despondent and sick at heart he wanders into the mountains. On his way he meets a beautiful girl. She notices him, but Burton, believing he has nothing to live for, passes on. The tri weekly coach has been held up and a description of the robbers given, one man drawing a sketch of Black Jack, the leading robber, and a posse starts out after them. In the meantime, the prospector stumbles into the cave of the robbers. He explains what brought him there and the robber is satisfied, and offers him money to go East, which Burton refuses. The sheriff gets on the trail of the robber and just as the prospector is about to leave, the posse surprises them. They are bound, put on their horses and brought to town, to be hung. The sheriff asks the crowd if anyone wants to say good-bye to the robber and prospector. No one responds until Nell Carter, the girl who has ridden up to the scene, dismounts and kisses Burton. It puts new life into him. Nell cuts his ropes, warns him to be careful and escape when possible. The posse starts, and Jim sees an opportunity to make a bolt. He gets away, hides until nightfall, then comes to bid the girl good-bye. They love each other and, mounting horses, they cross the border line just as the posse again come in sight. But they are in Mexico and cannot be reached.

THE NEW PHYSICIAN (June 26).—Jack Harrison, a young physician, and Helen Stuart, his sweetheart, have a little tiff over a trivial matter. Helen snubs Jack on the street the next day. Glancing around she sees him in a fit of laughter at the rebuke administered him, and resolves to teach him a lesson. She sees a sign in a window calling for nurses, no experience necessary. She goes in and enrolls. Jack is called to a small town to take charge of a hospital, while his old college chum goes on a vacation. All the girls in the town fall in love with him and try to make his acquaintance. They are unsuccessful, and finally one of the young ladies decides to become sick and be taken to the hospital for treatment. As soon as the rest discover this they are also stricken with various complaints, and one by one are taken to the hospital. The place becomes so crowded that another nurse is needed, and Jack wires to the city for assistance. Helen is chosen as the one to send. She arrives and as she enters the ward, she meets Jack. Surprised at the sight of each other, they fail to remember their quarrel, until they have embraced, and then Jack refuses to allow her to renew it, and keeping an arm about her, takes her into the hall. The invalids are amazed at this turn of affairs and rise en masse from their cots to voice their protests. Jack, looking through the key-hole, sees them dancing excitedly around the room, and having suspicioned all along that they were not very ill, resolves to make them take their medicine. The girls hear him at the door and hurriedly get back in bed. Gravely he feels each ones pulse, and mixing some bitter but harmless medicine, proportions it equally among them. Retiring to the hall he and Helen look through the key-hole at the wry faces as the potion begins to take effect.

FROM FIREMAN TO ENGINEER (June 27).—Reardon is a fireman on a yard engine. He is very much in love with Molly Duncan, the roadmaster's daughter, and Molly thinks that Reardon is the candy, but when they come to talk things over with the old man Duncan, they run up against a snag, for Duncan assures Reardon emphatically that he is far too presumptuous and that nothing short of an engineer is good enough for his daughter. The loving couple are very much dismayed at this turn of affairs, but Reardon valiantly resolves that he will get an engine or die in the attempt. The next day as the superintendent comes to the office, Reardon stops him and asks for an engine, but is assured that he is not yet capable of handling one, and his application is turned down. The superintendent's little daughter, who is a warm admirer of Reardon, comes to make him a little visit and as they are talking, the limited express pulls in. Reardon shows the child the workings of the yard engine, and in the midst of the conversation is called away. He leaves the child on the engine, who in playing with the mechanism, starts the locomotive. From a point on the platform where he has been called, Reardon sees the engine start off and endeavors to catch it, but falls. He appeals to the engineer of the limited for help, but the limited is ready to start and the engineer refuses to intervene without orders. Finally Reardon knocks him down, uncouples the engine and starts madly in pursuit. After an exciting chase he finally reaches the runaway engine, couples to it and brings it to a stop. Later he brings it to the point whence it started and is received with cheers by the crowd and the frantic father of the child. That night Reardon again calls on Molly Duncan. While in conversation with her, he is observed by her father, who irately orders Reardon off the premises. At this juncture a crowd of Reardon's fellow-workers appear upon the scene, together with the superintendent, and announces to him the fact that as a reward for his bravery he has been made an engineer. Reardon calls Duncan's attention to his remark of the preceding day, relative to the match, reminding him of the fact that Reardon is now an engineer, and Duncan gives his consent.

BRIDGET'S EXPLANATION (June 28).—An antiquarian has among his precious possessions two priceless Egyptian bowls, dating from the Phoenician Era. He has so much pride in these bowls, and so many inquiries to see them from his friends, that he selects an evening when all can inspect them at the same time. With great pride he expounds the wonderful age of these bowls, and lectures about them to the enthusiasm of his hearers. Then as a climax, he invites them to another room to drink to his lucky purchase. Before leaving the room, however, he beseeches his hired girl to be extra careful of the bowls, but he overdoes it and simply makes the servant nervous over her responsibility. She starts to dust the bowls when rash, and one falls to pieces on the floor. The professor, in the inner room, while joyously drinking to his own favorable find, hears the crash and is seized by a fit He rushes back to find one of his loved bowls in pieces and in anger he demands how it was done. Each one of his guests, too, demand how it was done, and the girl complies, going through in pantomime, the preliminaries to the breakage. She illustrates with the other priceless bowl and to show how she broke the first she lets the second fall.

A TRAMP ELEPHANT (June 28).—Three weary travelers, having arrived somewhere in their special box, see in front of them some bills of a circus. Looking around the yard after making their somewhat incomplete toilet, they see the cars of the show quite close to them. It was natural for them to inspect. They find one open to enter. Seemingly it was the wardrobe car, for on the floor lay an elephant skin and head waiting for two human forms to introduce themselves inside to make a funny imitation of the real animal. The thought is suggested to the weary travelers that it might be a means to an end, to procure breakfast, so they quickly avail themselves of the gift fate had sent them. Two of the liveliest quickly insert themselves, while the other donning a keeper's uniform, straightway start to test their fortunes. Unfortunately the inmates of the elephant were not satisfied with their condition as the keeper and they found ample cause to grumble. For instance when the meals came round for the employees of the circus the keeper got a full meal, while the poor elephant got a bundle of hay. Finally the elephant holds the police force at bay by squirting a hose of water through his trunk and escapes.

WHAT THE DRIVER SAW (June 29).—Cab 11 stops before May Roberts' home and May Roberts and Harry Nugent get in. The driver lifts the lid in the top of the cab and sees Harry kiss May. They get out at the theater and Harry tells the driver to call for them. A bearded young man hails cab 11 and gives an address to the driver. The driver peeps through the hole and sees the man reading a letter. The driver takes a pair of opera glasses from his pocket and also reads the note. "Dear Buck: The enclosed will introduce you as Lord Milday to May Roberts. Her ma is anxious for a title, so it will be easy money. You must catch the steamer sailing on the third, so hurry the wedding. Cal." As they reach the address a machine drives up and ma gets out. Buck gets from the cab and introduces himself to ma and shows the note. Cab 11 goes to the theater for Harry and May. When they reach home, ma introduces the bogus lord and sends Harry away. Buck forces his attentions upon May, who remains formal and cold. Ma returns with a letter and asks Buck to mail it for her. After a profuse leave-taking Buck goes. Through the lid in the cab the driver reads the address of the letter ma had given Buck to mail. It is to Harry. Buck opens the letter. The driver reads it with him. It tells Harry that ma has made arrangements for May to marry a lord. When he leaves Buck, the driver gives him his card. Next morning he is called to a flower store. Buck comes out and gets into the cab. Through the lid the driver sees him take a note from his pocket, he reads: "Dear Mrs. Roberts:—Received a cable this morning of my father's death. Must sail on the third to claim my estate. Bring your daughter to 69 Bleak St., at eight o'clock tonight and we will be married. Lord Milday."

Buck puts the note into the box of flowers and takes them to Mrs. Roberts. Cab 11 is hailed before a jewelry store by Harry. Through the hole the driver sees him handling a plain gold ring and sees him take a note from his pocket. His opera glasses again help him read. It says:

"Dear May:—Cannot understand your mother's note, but I have purchased a license and a ring and if you still love me come to 672 Rose Ave. at eight o'clock tonight and we will be married. Harry."

The driver copies the address and puts it into his pocket. Harry gives the note to the butler at May's house. At 7.30 that night cab 11 drives slowly up and down past the house, until ma comes out, dragging May after her. She sees cab 11, gives a paper to the driver. The driver destroys the paper, drives to 672 Rose Avenue, ma drags May into the house. The driver peeps into the window and sees ma bring May into the room. Harry steps out. May rushes to him, ma faints, the minister rushes in with a pitcher of water. Harry takes the pitcher from him and tells him to marry them first. After the blessing the minister takes the pitcher and hastens to revive ma, while the couple embrace.

MELIES.

THE COWBOY KID (July 4).—Danny, the little eight-year-old cowboy, while amusing the boys with his lariat, is interrupted by the arrival of Dick, the artist, to whom Mr. Wilson introduces his daughter, Bee. The artist falling in love with her, wins Bee away from Jake, her fiance. Jake seeks revenge and with Slim, steals the proceeds of a sale of cattle made by Bee's father, and kidnapping Dick, forces him to sign a note, saying that he stole the money, after which Jake's gang intend to compel him to quit the country. Bee's father suspects Dick, owing to his disappearance, and Danny, sent to get Jake's help to capture the thief, discovers the plight of the artist and tells Bee. The two ride to the rescue and with their pistols drawn compel a surrender. Releasing the artist who, with Bee's assistance, binds Jake and Slim, Danny rides for help. The cowboys, led to the appointed meeting-place, capture the whole gang and Danny receives the congratulations of the ranchers for ridding them of the band of horse thieves who had so long remained undetected.

SELIG.

THE ADOPTED SON (June 24).—Mrs. Terry, a poor widow, cannot bear to see her baby hungry and leaves it with a note in the auto of the rich Mrs. Kenyon, who has just lost her own baby. Mrs. Kenyon decides to raise the baby as her own. She puts its clothes, a shoe and the note away. The missing shoe is treasured by the baby's mother, who never forgets to pray for her lost baby boy. Twenty-two years pass away, and Hugh, the adopted son, comes home to the Kenyons. Hugh is now a splendid young man and has become a lawyer. Mr. and Mrs. Kenyon are delighted with him and Mr. Kenyon turns over to him a fine law office. Mrs. Terry is the office scrub woman. Hugh is kind to her. The beautiful Elinore Pierce becomes Hugh's sweetheart. He wins a great lawsuit. Accidentally Hugh discovers the old baby clothes, the note and the shoe, and Mrs. Kenyon tells him their story. He takes the scrub woman home when she is taken ill in his office and there finds the missing shoe. The next day he brings Elinore, his fiancee, to his mother, who is overjoyed to find her son, and Elinore proves her love by kissing Mrs. Terry upon learning she is Hugh's mother.

PANSY (June 25).—To attract custom to his mountain resort, old man Heber buys a tame bear, Pansy, whose tracks in the woods enable him to advertise "Bear Hunting at Heber's." Among the resultant guests is Simon B. Hanamaker, a politician, who is worried over the coming election. He surprises Helen, Heber's daughter, petting the bear. He plans a hoax that he thinks will elect him, buys the bear, puts it in a cave and hires a moving picture man to photograph him in the act of killing the "savage" animal. Helen plans to save Pansy, and gets some mountaineers to place a wild bear in the cave. As Hanamaker appears to do battle, the bear rushes out and stampedes the whole outfit. The camera man stays long enough to get a good picture of Hanamaker in full flight, and, disgusted with him, he refuses his money and sells the film to the opposition. They use it at a Hanamaker meeting and the outcome is most ludicrous.

HIS FATHER'S BUGLE (June 27).—Fred, Mrs. Wilson's little boy, is grieved to be called in when he wants to play soldier. His mother comforts him by showing him his father's bugle and telling him its story. His father's valiant part in the Civil War brought him the bugle from the hands of President Lincoln. Fred, fourteen years later, goes as a soldier in the Spanish War, takink his father's bugle with him. In a desperate charge against a Spanish fort the color bearer is wounded, and Fred seizes the colors and carries them forward. He is about to plant the flag on the captured fort when he is shot and, in his dying moments, sends his father's bugle back to his mother, who places it reverently above the portraits of her husband and her son.

ELEPHANT BUTTE DAM AT ALBUQUERQUE (June 27).—A sensational educational subject, showing the world's greatest engineering project.

MURRAY, THE MASHER (June 28).—Murray, the masher, ogles Nellie, but she turns away, dropping a letter. He copies the address and returns it. Later, he overhears Carrie, Nellie's friend, give her address to a clerk and notes it. He writes to both. They consult their husbands and he gets a letter to call. He pledges his watch to buy some flowers, which he gives to Nellie. Carrie arrives and he gives them to her, and tries to make love to both. Their husbands, Charley and Tom, are announced and they hide him under a chair cover. The men enter and tell what they will do if they catch him. They go out and their wives hustle Murray up a fire-escape. A woman above gives him a warm reception. He retreats and the women decide to disguise him in the housekeeper's old clothes and cut off half of his mustache. Charley and Tom enter and swear to shoot him on sight. Nellie and Carrie decide they must smuggle Murray out of the house and hide him in a large hamper with some old clothes over him. The hamper is dumped from floor to floor to the yard. An express man carries the party to where the hamper is thrown into a stream. Murray escapes from it only to be chased through a barb wire fence into the woods by Charley and Tom. In his room the masher resolves to "Never Again."

Which Would YOU Rather Pay?

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.

Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a

FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC

Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1 3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No delays, no bother, no waste, no danger, no heat.

Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get a much better light at 1 3 your present cost.

I'M MUCH OBLIGED!

I've never felt quite so good over anything in my life as I have over the many manifestations of good will and confidence made by exhibitors since I merged the "Imp" with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and accepted exclusive territory from the same company for the Laemmle Film Service offices. I've received all sorts of letters and telegrams of congratulations, the tenor of them being, "Where you go, we follow. If the Universal is good enough for you, it's good enough for us!"

It goes straight to the heart — this sort of stuff. And it impresses me more than ever with the Big Fact that I am responsible to thousands of exhibitors for whatever I do. Consequently I herewith renew the promise I have made on several occasions—that I will look after your interests to the best of my ability and see that you always get a square deal. The Laemmle Film Service offices are now in better shape to give you a splendid service than ever in their history. Place your destiny in their hands and you can't possibly lose out!

Yours with best regards,

MAJESTIC.

THE LITTLE QUAKERESS (June 16).—A pretty little Quakeress named Patience Prim is helped to cross a stream by a diamond drummer, who happens to be near. The worldwise drummer insists upon accompanying Patience to her home. The drummer invites himself to call upon Patience, and makes his visit while the Quakers are having family meditations. He insists upon talking to Patience while she should be meditating upon her soul's welfare, which results in the Quakers all leaving the room and taking Patience with them. The drummer makes up his mind to win the little Quakeress, and succeeds in getting the town constable to aid him in a plan to kidnap the whole Quaker family. The constable waits outside of the house while the drummer enters and, taking his sample case out of his pocket, calls the Prim family around him, showing them the jewelry and diamonds. They are shocked by the display of worldliness and sin represented by the jewels, but are held spellbound by the salesman's tongue. The salesman succeeds in depositing a jewel on the person of each member of the family without their knowledge and, calling the constable, has them searched and placed under arrest. In single file, the stern father, the fat old mother, the prim old maid aunt, the sanctimonious brother and pretty little Patience are marched out and placed in a large furniture van. The long trip over rough country roads to the station house has many interruptions, and finally ends at the minister's, where Patience is presented to the drummer as a peace offering.

HOOP-SKIRTS, MY DEAR! (June 18).—When Nellie Halford's father objects to Jack Moore as his future son-in-law, the young folks appeal to Nellie's sporty old Uncle Jim for help. Uncle Jim learns that Nellie's father has planned to sneak off to a masquerade ball unknown to his wife and family, dressed as George Washington. Nellie, Jack, and Uncle Jim attend the ball also, after Uncle Jim has rigged himself up in a hoop-skirt that is a marvel of the dressmaker's art. After various experiences at the ball, Uncle Jim succeeds in enticing Nellie's father to a secluded corner of the ballroom, where behind the palms which shelter Jack and Nellie as an interested audience, father finds himself confronted by 'the two young folks while he is making love to the supposed lady in hoop-shirts. In order to square himself and keep Nellie from telling her mother, father consents to her marrying Jack, Uncle Jim succeeds in putting all concerned into the best of humor.

THE BOWERY PEARL FISHERS (June 18).—Herr Limburger is greatly excited by a report that the keeper of a rival oyster and chop house acros the street has found a valuable pearl in one of his oysters; so he puts up a sign, stating that he will pay a good price for all pearls found in the oysters bought in his establishment. A Bowery boy spreads the news among his pals, and with the aid of a string of pearls, bought at a "five-and-ten-cent store," they succeed in getting most of Herr Limburger's ready cash. A trip to Biffany's jewelry store with the worthless pearls shows Herr Limburger that he has made a bad bargain, but his wife proves to have a good capacity for oysters and finds a real pearl in time to save her husband's reason.

THE SERPENT (June 18).—Jean Malias, a poor but talented artist, while painting the picture of his blind sweetheart, is driven from the Countess' estate by the caretaker, and as he is about to leave, leading his blind sweetheart by the hand, he encounters the Countess herself. She grants him permission to make free use of her grounds and also honors him by posing for a portrait.

During the sitting, the Countess expresses her love for the young artist, and is spurned by him. The woman's rage knows no bounds. She writes a letter upbraiding the young artist for the liberty he has taken with her, and further tells him that his conduct is not only a gross insult, coming as it does from a plebeian, but that her honor and that of her husband has been attacked. She craftily arranged that this letter falls into the hands of the Count, who after he has read it, plans with his wife to get the young artist to visit the estate again. They do this by sending him a letter signed by the Countess asking him to call and finish the portrait.

The young artist cannot resist the beckoning finger of fame and fortune that will be his if he finished the portrait, and unsuspectingly he goes to the estate. He is set upon by ruffians and badly beaten. The Countess relents as she sees the boy lying unconscious on the ground and throwing herself across his body, she confesses the truth to her husband. The Count befriends the innocent victim of the woman's wile and assists him to fame and fortune.

HER FATHER, THE SHERIFF (June 22).—The Sheriff, father of the girl and a handsome son whom he is educating at an Eastern college and his good wife, constitute the Sheriff's family. The Sheriff's pay is not princely, and he finds it hard to make ends meet. He is sorely tempted by a dishonest cashier of a small bank, who is anxious to annex for his own use a consignment of gold that is expected at the bank. The cashier, to cover up his tracks is willing to let the Sheriff and his friends in on a good thing. The Sheriff falls for the scheme temporarily, and covers his track by means of a false telegram calling him out of town.

Of course the Sheriff does not leave town, he is too busy robbing the bank and hiding the loot in a rendezvous in the wilderness. The gold arrives at the bank on time and disappears the same night. The cashier is found bound and gagged and tells a glowing story of a daring hold-up by a masked band.

During her father's absence the Sheriff's daughter determines to take the trail and run the robbers down herself. With two hounds and her brother's Eastern chum she starts out. The dogs readily picked up the scent and follow it to the robbers' retreat, where the girl discovers that her father is implicated in the crime. Her father has already repented his step in the matter and has declared to the others that he will return the gold, resign his office and let the law deal with him. While he holds up the others, the Sheriff's daughter secures the gold and returns it to the bank. When the cashier learns of this, he accuses one of the men of breaking faith with him and they are soon in a deadly clinch, and disappear over the brink of a mighty chasm. Later they are found lifeless at the foot of the cascade, thus paying for their sin.

THE QUEEN OF MAY (June 25).—Mrs. Bartlett, a widow, finds herself and little girl on the verge of starvation, and is only saved by the timely assistance of Mrs. O'Grady, a neighbor as poor as herself, who nevertheless cheerfully shares what little she has with her more unfortunate sister. She assists Mrs. Bartlett to obtain a position at one of the theaters and the little girl accompanies her mother, and being an exceptionally bright child, she learns by heart the part of Oliver, in "Oliver Twist," the show which is having a steady run in the theater.

She reads in the paper that the stage children are going to Central Park for a May party and tries to obtain a card of admission. The Secretary tells her she has to appear on the stage before she can join these children. She leaves, feeling very much disappointed.

That evening at the theater, five minutes before the rise of curtain, Oliver Twist has not arrived. Nancy Sikes brings the widow's child forward dressed as Oliver and says she is willing to stake her professional reputation that the child can play the part. Fagin, the stage manager, is doubtful, but the curtain signal has been given and he decides he will risk it—her appearance proves successful.

She returns the next day just as the stage children are getting in the car to go to the May party—her reputation has preceded her and they cordially receive her, and elect her Queen of May.

IN THE BALANCE (June 29).—Frank Dallas is secretly loved by Helen Mackey, a girl who is a frequent visitor at his mother's home. The girl shows her love for Frank, but is not regarded with any acknowledgment. Frank starts on his trip and joins his chum at his bungalow.

One day, while Frank is hunting he meets the wife of Bob Black, a smuggler. The woman becomes infatuated with Frank and he with her. Thinking her single, he proposes to her and begs her to go away with him—the woman, realizing her husband's vindictive nature, insures herself against his revenge by informing the Secret Service officers of her husband's occupation. Black, while endeavoring to escape, is shot and falls over the cliff; believing her husband dead, the woman joins Frank and goes away with him. Black recovers and escapes from the Secret Service officers.

Frank brings his intended wife to his home and his mother takes her to her heart. Helen Mackey remains silent, although her heart is aching at losing Frank. Black sees the announcement of Frank's coming marriage in a paper and decides to repay his wife for her treachery. His wife sees him at the window and is overcome, believing she sees a vision of the dead man. She is taken from the ballroom and at her request left alone. Black forces an entrance into the house and denounces his wife. She at last prevails on him to leave, after bribing him with a large sum of money.

Two officers seeing Black leaving the house by the window, call for him to stop. Black starts back toward the house, but seeing his way blocked, fires on the officers, who return the fire and Black wounded, falls back into the room. Realizing that death is near he denounces his wife in Frank's presence and opens his eyes as to the character of the woman he was about to make his wife.

RELIANCE.

ONE MAN'S LOVE (June 19).—Belle Grant, a beautiful American girl, goes to a ball at the Embassy, and wins the attention of the Russian Grand Duke Boris. During the ball he removes Belle's slipper and drinks champagne from it. Next morning her father reads of this escapade in the papers, and is very much annoyed over it. When a vaudeville manager appears and offers the girl a thousand dollars a week to go on the stage, her father vows if she accepts it he will disown her. However, nothing daunted, she leaves her home and goes upon the stage. Her former sweetheart, a young ensign in the navy, follows her and begs her to return with him. He finds her with the Duke and she laughs at him. As the companion of the Duke, she finds herself in the midst of a very gay set. After going the pace that kills for a time she finds her vogue has waned. Cast off by her gay friends and disowned by her father she sinks lower and lower. One day she is arrested upon the streets for vagrancy. When she is brought up in court she is fined fifty dollars, or one year on the island. Having no money she is about to be led away when the ensign, who happened to be in the courtroom, sees and recognizes her. He steps to her side—pays her fine and takes her to his home, where his housekeeper cares for her. When he asks her later to be his wife, she refuses—knowing her own unworthiness—but he finally persuades her to accept his love, for he forgives her.

THE FORBIDDEN WAY (June 22).—Jeff, a mountaineer, has an argument with his neighbor, Creed, over the boundary between their lands. Jeff hires a surveyor, Graham, to survey the boundary line. Still Creed is not satisfied with the decision and, after a quarrel, he shoots Jeff. Graham carries him to his cottage, where Jeff's beautiful wife, Judith, cares for her wounded husband. When he recovers, Jeff shows plainly that he is tired of Judith. Graham's heart goes out to the woman so neglected and hurt, and before long he falls in love with her, she reciprocating his affection. He reads to her, but she realizes that they are drifting too close to the forbidden way, so she sends Graham away. He decides to return to the city, and writes Judith a note, telling her of this. This note makes her realize the loneliness of her life after Graham is gone and, without stopping to consider, she rushes out of the cabin. She begs him to take her away with him. Meantime Jeff has returned and, missing his wife and finding the note, he starts after her, finding her in Jeff's cabin. He accuses her and the surveyor starts toward them. At this second Creed passing by sees his old enemy through the window and, raising his gun, levels it at Jeff. Graham sees him and just has time to push Jeff out of the way and receives the bullet in his own body. He falls to the ground dying. He begs Jeff to allow Judith to kiss him just once. Jeff consents and the woman kneels beside the man she loves and presses a kiss on his lips.

THE DIVIDING LINE (June 24).—Fred Little and Charles Wright are both in love with Virginia Wrayburn, whose heart is, at the beginning of the war, pledged to the Southern cause. When Lincoln and Lee send their calls for volunteers, Fred goes with the North and Charles with the South, in spite of the fact that these two men have been lifelong chums and companions. Charles learns before he leaves to join the Southern forces that Virginia is the fiancee of his old chum, Fred. This comes as a great surprise and he determines to forget her.

Early in the struggle Charles is given an important mission to perform by his Commander-in-General, the carrying of despatches to an important point. Northern scouts learn of Charle's mission and Fred, without knowing that he is pursuing his old friend, starts on his track. Charles now realizing that he is being pursued takes refuge in a deserted log cabin. Shortly afterward Fred and two soldiers also come to the cabin to take a much needed rest. Lighting a candle, he sees a foe is present. Charles thus awakened leaps to his feet, draws his revolver, then comes the recognition. For a moment they meet in an embrace, in which all the horrors of war are forgotten; then comes the terrible realization that they are enemies.

Fred obeying his orders demands the despatches; Charles refuses to give them up; blows out the candle and tries to escape. In the darkness Fred shoots, and the troopers hearing the shot rush to the aid of their officer. They reach the cabin just as Fred shoots his friend, takes the despatches, and passes out into the night. Charles regains consciousness and though mortally wounded determines to try to recapture the despatches. Mounting his horse he starts in pursuit.

He follows Fred to the home of Virginia and there getting him by surprise secures the papers. The house is soon surrounded by Southern soldiers. This means capture and death for Fred. But Charles succeeds in persuading him to change uniforms with him and when the Southern officer enters the room, Charles is arrested. However, before he succumbs to the terrible wound, he

The Money in the Cash Box Tells the Story

To-day most films are good enough to exhibit. When the crowds don't come back, the trouble is usually with the lens outfit. A defective lens outfit makes a good film seem bad—gives blurred or dull, eye-straining pictures—drives people away—cuts down your profits. But with the right lens outfit you can improve the quality of your pictures—attract the crowds—fill the cash box.

A CHILD'S INFLUENCE (June 27).—Godfrey Clark, his charming wife, and their pretty little daughter were impatiently awaiting the coming of his college chum, Andrea Sarto. He is met at the station by Godfrey and the two men show their delight at being together once more.

On being introduced to Mrs. Clark, Andrea is immediately attracted to the fascinating woman, and while an honorable man would have resisted the temptation, he seeks every opportunity to be with her. Clark, who is a civil engineer, is unexpectedly ordered to report for work in a distant part of the country. He regrets parting with his friend, but has no hesitancy in leaving him with his wife and child.

Andrea now proceeds to make good use of his time and even goes so far as to intercept a letter from Godfrey to his wife and forges one to take its place, which duly reaches her. This forged letter announces to the wife that her husband had gone away with another woman. Mrs. Clark is both heartbroken and mortified, and Andrea realizing this is his opportunity renews his suit with vigor.

He might have succeeded with the tortured woman had it not been for an accident to her little girl, who fell from the window in the delight at seeing the form of her father in the distance. The eloping wife was called back at the supreme moment by a maid, who reported the accident to her. Mother-love triumphed over jealousy and she returned to the house.

Meanwhile her admirer while awaiting her coming was thrown from his horse and killed. So when the civil engineer reached home it was to discover that his little daughter was not very seriously injured and to be greeted with unusual warmth by his wife, who in telling him of the death of his friend kept the secret of that friend's attempted dishonor.

HIS OTHER SELF (June 29).—A startling photoplay, with King Baggot in a dual role; he is the lover and Violet Horner is the girl. On returning from a walk with her lover the girl is handed a box of American beauties, which is accompanied by a note. The lover asks to see it; she in a spirit of fun refuses—and tells him to guess the name of the writer. He then demands to know the name of the sender and she, refusing to divulge same, a quarrel ensues and he leaves the house in anger.

Arriving at his home, he seats himself before the fire and sadly ponders on the fickleness of women. Finally, he falls asleep and in his dream sees in himself another man. Suddenly awaking, he sees himself in evening attire leaving the room. Hastily arising from the chair and picking up his pistol, he follows his Other Self. His Other Self leads the way to the girls home, he in pursuit. His Other Self enters the house and room from which he, himself, had departed in anger a few hours previous. He arrives on the scene just in time to see the girl struggling in the arms of his Other Self. No longer able to resist the temptation, he fires at his Other Self, who has dared to ill treat his sweetheart. Apparently the shot does not take effect, for his Other Self, with a smile of satisfaction, turns and leaves the room. The dreamer now awakes in reality and at once rushes to the telephone to be satisfied that his fears are unfounded. He at last succeeds in bringing the girl to the 'phone, and when assured of her safety a sigh of relief escapes him, and yet another, when she tells him the flowers were a birthday gift from her father.

PORTUGUESE JOE (June 29).—The sailormen patronize the saloon kept by Portuguese Joe and his pretty wife and they put it over the simple dago in a peculiarly sailor-like fashion. They get their drinks and are not willing to pay. One day one of them carried the scheme so far as to get a drink on the nod and then to swallow the contents of the glass, into which he had poured a white powder that he carried with him. Feigning death, he was dragged out of the hotel by Joe, who was alarmed lest the police should appear and a dead drunk be found on the premises. So Joe put the man on the street.

Several of the sailor-men habitues seeing the powder, tasted it and finding it only sugar, pointed out how Joe had been stung. Joe's little wife, like himself, conceived a suspicion of sailor-men in future and Joe thereafter was more careful of his naval guests.

THE FLIRT (June 13).—She was a flirt. To her flirtation was the greatest indoor sport. Respect of that organ of many tunes called a man's heart was lacking in her composition. Such an hypothesis as that a man's love is a serious thing would be as funny to her as humor.

She was pretty. She was graceful and gay; yet sometimes she would be filled with a melancholy seriousness and a meditative wistfulness; and it was while she was in this ultra-feminine mood that we thought that the careless and ruthless manner in which she abused and abased Cupid was not related to her real self, but rather to a wild, warring spirit that had somehow become associated with hers, and that her genuine impulse and auto-suggestive integrity were tender and true.

Among the men she loved, worshipped and pursued her was one not much more than a boy. To him she was the world and everything thereafter. Yes, she was everything to him—and then the rest. And smiling, cynical men and women who could remember things themselves called him "her dog."

The flirt had an aunt, a haughty, snobbish aunt, who owned a very beautiful and equally expensive summer home in the country. She contemplated a sail to Europe, and invited the niece to take possession of the property in her absence. So the goddess moved her temple, and her followers, their shrine.

There came to the summer hotel near by—a real man. Her pride, or vanity, or the indefinite but emphatic desire for a new triumph, clamored for the attentions of the newcomer. By wit, wile and guile she was determined to attract and interest him. He observed her advances with a kind of surprised doubt. His attitude toward her was almost obsequious, polite and reserved to a degree of servility. That's what she couldn't understand.

Then he left, and she sent her dog to follow him. He reported that the quarry had gone to the Riverside Hotel, and there she, too, went—and there she met him. She was in the dining-room one night, hoping that he might enter. She called the waiter—and he was the waiter!

Her pride learned its merited lesson; she accepted the love of the boy—and what is more important, she returned it.

THE DIAMOND PATH (June 16).—There's something brave and bold and individual about the name Dorothy—so that's her name. Dorothy happened to be a reporter, and a reporter always happens to be where things are happening. That's why she's connected with the tale.

Her landlady happened to have a daughter who happened to be the maid of an heiress. There were two impecunious scions of society. To be accurate, they were impoverished. They couldn't make any money, so the next thing to do was get some anyhow. They didn't waste scruples on the exact method of obtaining the necessary. The Diamond Path looked not so worse to them.

They conceived the kind idea of convincing their social friends that paste was just about the same as diamonds, settling the argument by substituting the bogus for the genuine stones. However, one of their victimized friends was not entirely convinced—and the maid was accused. Remember the maid? Her mother, with fears and tears, told Dorothy all about it and then a few sentences. Dorothy determined to detect the real girl and exonerate the girl.

Diamonds, grit, cowardice, cruelty, criminality, bravery, the heart of a determined girl, vindictiveness, vindication, just deserts and gratitude play the leading part in the rest of the story. Dorothy and honesty triumph, and the end of the gentlemen thieves and the story are simultaneous.

THE POWER OF THOUGHT (June 29).—Lois loved Phil, and Phil worshiped Lois. It seemed as though they had loved as long as they had lived, and would love until the final interruption. There was another chap named Tooker. He probably loved himself more, but he liked Lois a little, too—a little too much for Lois' comfort.

There was a rustic bench beneath an ancient tree in the near distance. There, of a moonlit night, Lois and Phil would whisper the old story. Tooker had watched them, and when Phil went, he approached Lois and attempted to kiss her. In her anxious helplessness, she dropped the flower that Phil had brought her, and turning, fled. Tooker saw the flower—and his opportunity. A little later he entered the tavern where Phil and a few companions were chatting and laughing. Proudly he waved the dying flower, and spoke wild words of her infidelity. Just after Phil struck him, the duel was arranged.

Fassett, in love with Cleo, Lois' sister, ran back and breathlessly explained what had happened. In desperate grief, Lois snatched her scarf, told him to run and give it to her love, and tell him if he lived to wave the scarf, ride back to her at the trysting place.

Tooker was a coward, as every man who lies about a woman is, and in craven fear he ran from the field of honor, where such as he have no place, mounted his horse and rode off in frenzied fright and flight. Lois, waiting in trembling anxiety, saw the wild rider, and her tortured thoughts at once conveyed to her the grim supposition of her lover's death; the last terrible grief that she was ever to know ate into her life and youth; the broken heart stopped, and the startled soul fled. And there Phil found her, murdered by the power of thought: a martyr to cruel imagination.

THE VOICE OF THE MILLIONS (June 23).—There were misery and poverty in those homes of the strikers, there were sickness and death. Happiness was not the issue of the strike, it was bread; not contentment, but life. It was the ancient struggle of the weak many, against the mighty few, the inefficient millions against the invincible one. It is true that they had committed the unpardonable error of being born poor, but life was strong in them and sweet to them—though it was only existence. Their mouths were hungry, their hearts were red with rage and wrong—and their hands might have become that hue, too—but for a girl.

A girl who knew sorrow's misery and pain's distress, a girl who knew the meaning of love of life and fear of death, and the torture of the destitution that exaggerates the one and aggravates the other. Like a Daniel of another sex, she championed their cause. She cautioned, encouraged, guided and guarded them. She taught them patience, forbearance and fortitude. She fought with a fierce, fiery devotion. She organized meeting after meeting, and from the platform she cried their truth to the world, and emphasized the neglected fact that they had as much right to live as he who took the work of their hands and gave them hunger for reward. But the mill-owner was obdurate. It did not occur to him that these were human beings asking only the right to avoid death.

At last she went to him, with the pathetic human evidence of the wrong, and pleaded for redress. The mill-owner's son saw and heard her, and something in the passionate, pleading, pleasing voice, and something in the sympathetic face, and something in the tender, thoughtful eyes arrested and interested him. He dressed in the clothes of the workman and attended the meetings. He listened to her, he was carried away by the bitter truth of her eloquence, and he saw the light and the right.

He enlisted in the fight, and she learned to depend upon him as an able lieutenant and a devoted sympathizer. You know, she thought he was one of the men. The gods have a mill of their own; "they grind slow, but they grind exceeding fine." And it was decreed that the master of men meet the Master of Men. The thing that conquers conquerors, the enemy that vanquishes kings, that respects the mansion no more than the manger, entered the chamber of velvet and gilt and summoned the mill-owner to a tribune greater than all the millions who had judged him.

His son inherited the millions and their power, and he told and offered the girl all. She had almost learned to love him, but his justice and generosity completed the teaching. She gave herself to him, and he gave the millions to the millions.

GEM.

HILL FOLKS (June 18).—Years before he had gone away, had crossed his native mountains into a country where might is measured by other things than the strength of arm and the amount of arms one possessed. He had gone and got cultured, that's what! He had exchanged instinct for intelligence, cunning for intelligence, stealthiness for strategy. He had bartered brawn for brain—but he kept enough of the former for emergencies.' He had studied the law and was returning to introduce and enforce it in a place where the only law was the denial and defiance of t

As he rode along the narrow road he came across Judith, a playmate of the old years and the sweetheart of his kidhood days. She was now a woman, with the tender suggestion of young and yearning womanhood expressing itself in her shy recognition and bashful welcome. He gazed at her, and a dead memory of the young yesterday was resurrected and restored. Then, his eyes feasting on her pensive face, as though they were reluctant to look away from the sympathy and sincerity growing and glowing there, he rode on into the town.

The mountaineers muttered sullen words when they saw the shingle, "Clem Parker, Attorney at Law." They resented his return and intrusion, and disliked the significant suggestion of the sign—to them a sign of no good omen. For between you and us, they were moonshiners, and his face looked too honest and earnest for their future prosperity and security.

It happened at Judith's birthday dance. The leader of the clan, inspired by a quantity of whiskey, attempted to kiss Judith, and Clem struck him down. That night the clansmen held council in the old barn and decided to take peremptory vengeance on the offender. Judith, eagerly and anxiously listening, heard all, and quickly apprising her father they hastened to prepare Clem, but arrived just in time to be a little too late. The wounded lawyer and the fleeing riders conveyed the grim, graphic tale.

Their second attempt to wreak their wrath upon Clem, when they hurled him over the precipice, only resulted in the discovery of the distillery in the cave below. Even their attempt to kidnap Judith was frustrated by a kid who had learned their purpose and communicated it to the sheriff.

Determination and courage eventually triumphed over disorder and cunning, as they generally do. And the triumph included the victory of a greater law than that prohibiting moonshiners.

For one night, while the old moon was smiling down upon a silly earth, Clem whispered something to Judith that brought a sweet blush to her cheeks and a tender glow to her eyes. And Judith said "yes."

AMBROSIO.

THE MANIAC (June 21).—An insane asylum is shown, with various inmates. One of the patients constantly plays chess, and one day makes his escape, carrying his board and chessmen. He boards a railroad train and enters a compartment occupied by a traveler, William Burns, whom he engages in conversation and proposes a game of chess. Burns is agreeable, and the two are soon absorbed in the game. The maniac suddenly startles his companion with a proposition that they play for each other's lives, and Burns then realizes the predicament he is in. His efforts to prolong the game and keep off the madman present tense situations. He finally manages to write a message for help on his cuff, which he manages to drop out of the window as the train is pulling out of a station. A baggage man finds the cuff and rushes to the trainmaster, who wires ahead to the police. The game is finally ended in favor of the maniac, and he gloatingly leaps upon his victim. Burns fights wildly for his life, but is no match for his crazy antagonist, and he is finally overcome. He is near death when the train arrives at the next station, and the police rush into the train and drag the maniac away.

NESTOR.

THE BANDIT OF TROPICO (June 17).—William Blake is a respected citizen of Tropico, Cal., a man looked up to by his neighbors and worshiped by a devoted daughter, whose love he fully reciprocates. The inhabintants of Tropico and other towns are much puzzled over the frequent robberies of the stagecoach which runs through Eagle Pass in the Sierras. The hold-ups have been boldly executed by a lone bandit who has made several good hauls. The robber is known as "The Mysterious Bandit of Eagle Pass." So bold and frequent have his depredations become that the State offers a reward of $5,000 for his capture, dead or alive.

Neither his neighbors nor his daughter, Kitty, connect William Blake with these robberies. They even consult him regarding the bandit and the State's reward, yet Blake is the bandit who is committing these daring hold-ups in order to provide his daughter with comforts and make her future secure. Both because he regards Jim Sherwood, the young sheriff, as a suitable husband for Kitty, his daughter, and to further protect his dual life, Blake encourages the young man's suit.

Disguising himself in rough garments and a thick, black beard, Blake steals out at night, successfully robs the stagecoach and, covering his tracks with extraordinary cunning, he eludes his pursuers and gets home without exciting suspicion.

Blake has occasion to knock down Pete, a tough cowboy, who, while drunk, insists upon being introduced to Blake's daughter. Pete follows Blake into a saloon where Blake is "treating the boys" and, thrusting aside Blake's proffered hand, shoots and mortally wounds him. Realizing that his time has come, Blake sends for Kitty and the young sheriff. He then writes a note advising his daughter to tell no one but Jim Sherwood. Kitty arrives in time to see him alone. She gets the note and the false beard before her father dies. The young sheriff, on being informed that Blake is the bandit, slowly burns the tell-tale evidence. He then takes Kitty to his arms.

THE LAND OF MIGHT (June 19).—The young homeseekers, John and Mary Anderson, come over the mountains in a prairie schooner. They select a spot for camp, unhitch their horses and start supper. While John is gone for game, the horses get away and Mary is forced to run after them, but before she comes up to them, both horses have been captured by three gold-seekers, Sid, Bill and a Mexican, and as their burro has just died, the men are delighted to get the horses. As soon as Mary appears and claims them, Sid is only too willing to return her property, not so Bill and the Mexican, however, and in consequence, Sid and Bill retire a short distance to fight it out. Sid is victorious, without having done more than give Bill a slight wound, so sending the Mexican to look after his partner, Sid accompanies Mary on her way toward their camp. John returns in the meanwhile, misses his wife and the horses and at once sets out on their trail, overtaking Mary and Sid just as the young wife's strength has about given out. As a reward for Sid's kindness, John insists upon the other accepting his saddle horse and as soon as Sid rides away, the husband and wife prepare to camp there for the night. Bill and the Mexican are in the meanwhile on the trail of Sid, so creeping up to where John and Mary have camped for the night, Bill is about to plunge his hunting-knife into the sleeping husband, believing him to be Sid, when his hand is stayed by Sid himself, who, having passed his partner and the Mexican creeping toward the camp and fearing for the lives of Mary and John, returned in time to prevent the tragedy.

BENEATH WESTERN SKIES (June 21).—Col. Person's Mexican foreman, Pedro, is in love with his master's daughter, Helen, who appears to like his companionship. Pedro's old sweetheart, Juanita, becomes very jealous.

Jim Carson, a dashing Easterner, comes to the Colonel's ranch with a letter of introduction and soon occupies the biggest corner in Helen's heart, much to Pedro's displeasure. The foreman attempts to undermine Jim by letting him ride Buck, an unmanageable bucking horse. Jim keeps his seat and, on dismounting, knocks the Mexican down. A fight follows, with victory going to the Easterner, which fact makes Jim popular with the boys and gains him the enmity of Pedro, who vows to be revenged. At the first opportunity he seriously wounds young Carson and carries Helen to a deserted shack. Jealous Juanita has not been idle. She follows the couple and lies in wait. Helen is soon left alone, a prisoner in the shack, to which Juanita fiendishly sets fire. She then overtakes Pedro and pleads with him.

Meanwhile Jim has managed to ride back to the ranch and gives the alarm. Col. Person, his cowboys and the wounded man, ride hard, bent on capturing the villain. They come upon Pedro and Juanita, but the wily Mexican gives them the slip and is only caught after a most thrilling chase. At the point of a gun, he is forced to tell of Helen's hiding-place. The girl is saved in the nick of time and the Mexican is left to the tender mercy of the boys.

HIS PUNISHMENT (June 18).—Lieut. Wade has been carrying on a clandestine courtship with Silver Star, a pretty Indian girl. Her father, Black Hawk, discovers that secret meetings are taking place, and endeavors to keep the lovers apart. Wade is promoted and transferred to a distant fort, and the Indian girl is forgotten in the whirl of military and social life with which he is surrounded.

Silver Star dies of a broken heart, leaving an infant, Little Dave, who is brought up by Black Hawk. Wade marries a daughter of a brother officer, the wedding being celebrated with pomp. Twenty years elapse, and the press of civilization forces the Indians westward. Black Hawk's tribe locates in the vicinity of Wade's post, and one day Little Dove comes face to face with her father. Her startling resemblance overwhelms him, and he starts as if a ghost had confronted him. The Indian girl, not knowing the cause of the man's agitation, casts off his detaining hand and goes on her way.

Little Dove tells her grandfather of the occurrence, and he relates to her the sad romance of her mother. She becomes incensed, and vows she will avenge her mother's desertion and death. Black Hawk consents to aid her, and she goes to Wade and informs him that the Indians are discontented, but that she believes a demonstration of force will keep them from resorting to violence. Wade falls into the trap, and calling his troops together marches out to impress the redskins. As they reach a valley the concealed Indians pour a rain of fire into their midst, and the surprised soldiers retreat in confusion. Wade is dragged from his horse and made a prisoner, and is triumphantly carried to the camp by the exultant Indians. Led by Little Dove, the squaws torture Wade until he is exhausted, and he is then led onto the blazing desert, and left to die, with his hands tied behind him.

That night Little Dove, her vengeance satisfied, realizes what she has done. Wade's accusing eyes seem to haunt her, and, stricken with remorse, she stealthily departs from the Indian village and goes to Wade. The still hand of death has preceded her, however, and she falls prostrate and caresses the still form of her father.

ON THE WARPATH (June 22—Two reels).—The film opens with a scene showing the old Indian chief, Arrow Head, selling beadwork at a railroad station. After the train departs he sits down in the shade and falls asleep, living again in his dream the days of his youth as a Yuma brave.

The Apache and Yuma Indians, as allies, had been waging a bitter warfare against the whites. The United States government massed large bodies of troops in the district, determined to crush out the guerrilla warfare. The Apaches were willing to make peace, but feared their allies. A conference was held between the Apaches, Yumas and the government representatives, at which the Apaches defied the troops, but the Yumas signed a treaty on condition that the government protect them against the Apaches.

During the conference Arrow Head met Red Feather, the daughter of the Sioux chief, and the two young people fall in love. Red Feather overhearing the plans of the Apaches to attack the Yuma camp, and fearing for the safety of her lover, sent her young brother to warn him. The Yumas, though outnumbered, were thus able to arrange a hurried defense, and the battle raged fiercely. Realizing that they must soon be annihilated by their ferocious adversaries, Arrow Head volunteered to ride to the distant fort and appeal to the soldiers for aid.

Mounted on a fleet horse, he dashed through the Apache lines, and though sorely wounded managed to elude his pursuers. His horse dropped from exhaustion and he found himself in sight of the Apache village. Red Feather sees him and conceals him in her tepee, where he rests and is given water to quench his thirst.

The pursuing Apaches are told by Red Feather that Arrow Head has gone by and they follow the direction she gives. She then brings her pony for her lover, and he reaches the fort without further mishap.

When the savages find they have been tricked Red Feather is punished by being staked out in the desert. The rescuing soldiers find her, and then continue their mad gallop to the scene of battle. A fierce encounter takes place, but the Apaches, attacked from the top of the hill by the Yumas, and from the front by the soldiers, are badly defeated. The old Yuma chief, mortally wounded, calls his braves about him, and as a reward for the bravery of Arrow Head hands the latter his head-dress—the insignia of rank—with the consent of the approval of the grateful tribe whose lives Arrow Head has saved.

COMET.

THE INTERRUPTED WEDDING (June 15).—Jimmy McElhern had just finished dressing for his wedding, and a final survey of himself in the mirror convinced him that, so far as appearance goes, the expectant bride would have no cause for complaint. But vexatious mishaps, while arranging his attire, caused him to be somewhat late, and in his mad rush to make up time lost, he accidently collides with a nurse girl who is taking a baby to the park for an airing. The impact is so forceful that she falls and sprains her ankle. In his desire to assist her, he relieves her of the infant, but as she attempts to rise, she is seized with a fainting spell, and all efforts to revive her prove futile.

An ambulance is summoned, and the girl is carried to a hospital for treatment. Jimmy is left with the infant on his hands. He offers it to a number of by-standers, attracted through curiousity by the ambulance, who laughingly refuse to relieve him of it, and in despair he rushes madly from the scene. He meets a policeman in his flight, and tries to force the infant upon him, but being unfamiliar with the facts, the guardian of the peace is unresponsive, so Jimmy promptly knocks him down. This only complicates affairs further, for the officer rises and pursues Jimmy, who succeeds in eluding him, and takes refuge in his own room. Throwing the baby on the bed, he drops in a chair and endeavors to gather his scattered senses. The hour appointed for his wedding has long since passed. Meanwhile the expectant bride has grown anxious, and comes in search of the delinquent. He noting her approach from the window, in an agony of fright, seizes the baby, throws it into a closet and closes the door. She enters the room in a towering rage, and demands an explanation. Jimmy tries to pacify her, but all in vain. Hearing the baby's yells, she opens the door of the closet and discovers it. Bursting into a torrent of tears, she roundly denounces him, and rushes from the room. He grabs the baby from its place of concealment and follows, calling to her in agonized tones, but she heeds him not. The policeman now enters and catches Jimmy just as he emerges from the door.

The mother of the baby, almost distraught at its long absence, has telephoned police headquarters, fearing the infant has fallen into the hands of kidnappers, so when Jimmy is dragged before the desk sargeant, the child is recognized, and he is held on the charge, and the distracted parents sent for. They arrive at the station, Jimmy is brought from his cell to answer, when the nurse, whose injuries were slight, has meanwhile recovered, enters the scene.

Mutual explanations and apologies follow, and Jimmy is released, and is hurriedly driven to the home of his bride to be. The unfortunate occurrences of the day are reviewed, the bride forgives him, takes him to her heart, and the wedding proceeds midst great rejoicing.

A PLUCKY RANCH GIRL (June 17).—Reduced to comparative poverty through unfortunate speculations Fred Williams, accompanied by his wife and daughter, Doris, gather the remains of his meager belongings, and starts overland by wagon for the far West.

Blessed with favorable weather conditions and excellent roads, the little party reach a wild and remote section in western Arizona, where, finding a suitable spot for a resting-place, they pitch their camp for the night. It being near the hour for the evening meal, Doris goes in search of water, while her mother prepares the cooking utensils.

The wildness of the surroundings makes her father somewhat solicitous, and he bids her be cautious, but she being a plucky Western girl, points significantly to the "forty-four" suspended in its holster from her girdle, smiles at his fears and disappears in a grove of firs.

Unknown to the little party, there was an Indian reservation not far distant and a number of redmen had surreptitiously smuggled in a generous supply of whiskey. All have been indulging freely, and in consequence are in a dangerous condition. One of their number, a chief of some importance, wanders away in his drunken stupor, and his steps are by chance led to where Doris is seen in the act of filling a vessel with water from a neighboring spring. Attracted by her beauty, and noting the solitude of the surroundings, he approaches her in a familiar manner, and endeavors to embrace her. She releases herself from his grasp, and with a well-directed blow knocks him down. Driven to frenzy he rises quickly, draws his knife and rushes toward her. She fires at him and he falls. Doris does not wait to learn how badly he is injured, but hastens to inform her parents of the circumstance. Fearful of the result, they immediately strike camp, and continue their journey.

In the course of their travels they shortly meet a ranch owner, who offers Williams favorable inducements to settle on part of his land. He gladly accepts. Some time has passed since the shooting of the Indian by Doris, and the occurrence is almost forgotten by them, and the family has settled down to a peaceful and quiet existence. Doris has won the affection of the ranch boss, and they are shortly to be married. The renegade Indian has meanwhile recovered, and learning her whereabouts, in a spirit of revenge he gathers some of his followers about him and plans an attack on the Williams' house.

The cowboys are quartered at some distance away, so that when the Indians surround the house, things look very dark for the family, but Doris's resourcefulness and pluck saves them. Under cover of the night she eludes the marauders, reaches the corral, mounts her pony, and after a thrilling ride through a shower of bullets, she returns with the cowboys, who ride with a wild dash to the rescue and after a blood-curdling battle, the Indians are annihilated.

POWERS

THEIR ONE DAY'S WORK (June 26).—A little girl, of winning personality, lives with her grandfather, who is quite unfortunate, in that the sheriff has taken his only horse for debt, and there yet remains a field to be plowed for sowing.

The old man is in despair and his grief is pitiful. The granddaughter sympathizes with him and casts about for relief. A trio of big, burly tramps visit the neighborhood and are loafing in the shade. The girl finds them and they notice her dejection. Sobbingly she tells them and the tramps become interested. They confer and devise ways and means to assist the old farmer. Going to the field they view the half plowed plot, observe the plow and debate the question. One of them has an idea and they act upon it. Hitching themselves to the plow they turn the sward, working diligently and perspiring profusely. Tired and leg-weary, they do not falter until the last furrow is turned over and then they drop from exhaustion, satisfied with the thanks of the little girl. They are brought to the farmhouse and given an appetizing supper, after which they wend their way down the dusty road elated that they have performed an act of kindness.

THE HELPING HAND (June 26).—A little girl attends Sunday School and is given a book to record acts of kindness, and she proceeds to go out after the prize offered. She places fly-paper on her father when he is asleep, to render his slumbers more peaceful, and then gives the silk hat and overcoat of her sister's beau to a tramp. She liberates a cage full of mice and they cause consternation among the guests. The police are summoned to find the missing garments, the father awakens to become entangled in the fly paper and there is much mystery until the child clears it up by exhibiting her book and enumerating the "helps" she has performed as instructed by the minister.

LUX.

THE GAMBLER (June 21).—Tom Bradford was well known to the habitues of Luke Stamford's saloon as an inveterate gambler; nevertheless, he is not devoid of some redeeming features. A change takes place when Alice Redmond comes from the East with her father, and Bradford gambles no more. Alice falls in love with him at first sight, and her love grows stronger when Bradford saves her from the cowardly assault of Lister, the bad man of the district.

One morning Bardford decides to sell out his gambling outfit, and his old friend Jess, the dancing girl, seeing that her chances of winning his affection are no more, goes off into the woods to hide her sorrow. There she sees Lister attempting to run away with Alice Redmond, who is in his power, having been surprised by him upon a lonely road. Jess rushes back to the saloon and tells Bradford, who, with the aid of the boys, dashes after Lister, and finally catches him. This paves the way for an introduction to Alice's father, and finally to a happy marriage, and Bradford is known as "The Gambler" no more.

INTERNATIONAL FILM TRADERS.

THE HEROIC GIRL FROM DERNA—This picture portrays the terrible assault upon Derna, in which the young Italian captain, Adolfo Bertini, was wounded in the forehead and, after a conflict, fell into the hands of the Arabs. This officer managed to protect a young Arabian girl from insult by the Turks, and thus gained the good will of the tribe to which she belonged.

When the cries of the news venders in Naples announced the capture of Captain Bertini his wife lost her senses from the shock. Eminent alienists proclaimed it a case of mental torpor, which could only be cured upon again seeing her husband. Maria, the little daughter of Captain Bertini, planned to go to Africa to find her father. Her mother did not notice her leave taking because of her condition. She disguised herself as a boy and managed to find a place on a merchant vessel. Her good disposition succeeded in gaining for her the affection of everyone. The father was freed and returned with his daughter to Naples. The presence of her husband and child brought the young woman out of her stupor, and happiness once again reigned in the house.

THANHOUSER.

THE FARM AND THE FLAT (June 23).—The young city chap had a month's vacation, nowhere to go and very little to spend when he got there. So he talked it over with his wife, and they evolved a great idea.

"We want to go to the country," the husband said, "now the country is full of rubes who want to come to the city. It should be an easy matter to find one who will let us occupy his farm for a month, if he will let him use this flat and our installment house furniture."

They advertised, and it paid. Out at Dreamland Neck, which is inconveniently located in Connecticut, lived a farmer who had long yearned to see the great city. He had heard, however, that at the Waldorf, the best tavern, they often charged $1 a day for rooms without meals, and that the cost of living appalled him. Finding a chance to see the wonders of the metropolis for nothing, he jumped at it, and the swap of homes was made with great joy on both sides.

The trouble was that neither couple was suited for the new environments. The country people were so busy jumping out of the way of trucks and autos that they had no time to enjoy themselves, while the city folk wearied of chopping wood, and trying to bring up chickens by hand. And just as they were getting sick and tired of their bargains, real unhappiness entered their lives.

The country chap knew all about gas. You light it with a match and blow it out when you are through. He proved that it was possible to do this and live, but the flat was wrecked. Both he and his wife decided that it was time to go home, and they departed with a rush, just before the police, firemen and the ambulances arrived.

In the meantime the city chap had picked up a bargain in horse flesh, a nag and a buggy for $34. The countryman would have never made the purchase, for he knew that the outfit belonged to the sheriff, also that the pretended owner was a tramp. The sheriff arrived shortly after the transfer of his property, and there was a fight. It was the belief of the sheriff that the city chap should accompany him to jail, but the city chap overruled him, and after a heated argument that severely injured the furniture, he escaped with his wife in the stolen buggy.

When the "swoppers" reached their respective homes, they called each other up by phone, and talked angrily. Still as each had injured the property of the other, they found that it would only be a waste of time to sue.

suitor. Just then word came that her wealthy aunt desired to give her a home in the city, and the young woman jumped at the chance. She was able to see the beauties of the Metropolis of which she had often dreamed. So she went away, waving a careless farewell to the "man she left behind her."

A year passed on, and again it was blossom time in the country; but the girl was in the city and had forgotten much of her former life. To her surprise, however, she was not happy in her new environments.

A titled suitor had entered her life, and for a time she thought she would marry him. Then one day she received from him a regular "city box of flowers," and at the same time her country sweetheart sent a fragrant branch with the simple message: "It is blossom time in the country."

The girl realized that she was losing much in life that had been dear to her, and in return had not received anything that really counted. She was stricken with homesickness and hurried back to the country, where her grandfather, with whom she had lived, welcomed her gladly, but could not understand why she had returned, for he was a man who was slow to comprehend things. Later he saw them in the apple orchard and then he understood.

"I'm glad my little girl came back in time," grandfather said. "I am glad that the blossoms were still in bloom, and that everything came out all right, but it was a mighty dangerous experiment, and we must never say a word about it."

The boy and the girl are happy, however, and always regard "Blossom Time," as the loveliest, and most important season of the year.

THE PROFESSOR'S SON (June 28).—The professor was wealthy, which was a lucky thing, for his mind was always in the past. He had an intimate knowledge of what had happened in prehistoric days, but utterly ignored what was going on in his own generation. When his wife died it was naturally a shock, and he almost hated the helples infant she left. Soon he returned to his studies, and having left word that his baby son must not be allowed to disturb him, soon practically forgot his existence.

In fact it rather puzzled him one day to find a boy of seven in his study, engrossed in a scientific book. He could not place the child at first, but finally remembered that it was his son and heir, and for the first time was proud of him. It struck the professor that here was something to do that would be worth while. The child seemed to have a bright mind and to be fond of books. The more the professor questioned him, the more satisfied he became, and he plunged enthusiastically into the work of a tutor.

Now the professor was very brilliant, and the child was very young. The course of study mapped out would have appalled a university senior, but the child tackled the work with enthusiasm. He made wonderful progress for a time, and then what any sensible parent could have predicted, happened. The boy suffered a nervous breakdown, and for a time hovered dangerously near the portals of the other world.

The grief stricken parent could not comprehend what had happened or how much he was to blame. He sorrowed because lessons were neglected, and while the child was convalescing, blandly started to renew them. He was not a cruel father, it should be stated, only a foolish one.

By rare good fortune, the helpless child had a sensible nurse, who had loved and cared for him from his birth. She stopped the lessons, defied the father, and bluntly told him that his conduct would certainly cause the death of his child if continued. The doctor, appealed to, upheld the nurse, and the worried professor consented that the nurse try her way to restore the health of the son he now loved deeply.

The nurse and the boy went to the country, where books were tabooed and healthful exercises and enjoyment favored. Later, the professor, in response to a letter from his boy, went to visit them. He found that the child had forgotten all about cube root, integral calculus and the fourth dimension, but that he had learned to fish and wanted father to join him.

The worldly wise nurse came out of the farmhouse shortly after the professor arrived, shaded her eyes, looked off and smiled.

She saw a learned man and a happy little boy seated side by side at the bank of a stream fishing and having an enjoyable time. And she knew that the professor realized that his ways had been wrong, and that infant prodigies seldom grew up to be leaders of men and minds, unless they were permitted to be boys when they were boys and not little priggish bookworms. There would be plenty of time later for study, she mused, but so far as the present was concerned, she rejoiced that the child she loved was to be permitted to have his time to play.

LOVE'S RAILROAD (June 26).—This subject depicts the trouble of lovers through life. The first scene is "taking on fuel for the trip," and "taking water on the fly," which deals with the lovemaking of the couple. Then follows the "proposal for better service," the "doubleheading of the passengers," and the "coupling up of the train." The couple soon take on excess baggage—a baby—and with that there are "orders misunderstood," and then there's a wreck—or the couple part. Next we see "the wrecking crew in action"—the divorce court—and this is followed by the "wreckage being cleared," and then "traffic is resumed on the old schedule"—and they live happily.

PLANTING-TIME (June 26).—This deals with the adventures of a college boy and college girl at home during a vacation. The girl and boy live in cottages adjoining each other. They are both nuisances to their parents. In order to keep them out of mischief the parents send them out into the garden to plant some seeds. In attempting to clean the garden they throw all the waste across the fence. The boy and girl keep throwing it back and forth. They get into a row, and, of course, there is rough-house—water and the garden hose is brought into play. The story ends with the young folks getting together and an agreement is reached.

THE CALL OF THE ROSE (June 28).—Robert Moore, a young Western miner, marries an Eastern girl and brings her out West to live. Before their marriage, Grace Moore was a musician and a professional singer. Her husband is devoted to her. The little Western cottage in which they live, the husband tries to make as fine a home as his limited capital permits him. For a time the young wife is happy and fills in her time between watching her husband dig for gold and singing in the wilderness. Soon, however, the emptiness of her inactive existence begins to pall on her. She grows wistful and longing.

An operatic manager on his vacation hunting near the mining district, is one day attracted by Mrs. Moore's wonderful voice. He follows the notes to their source and, after having refreshed himself with the food and drink which Mrs. Moore graciously provides, he gives Mrs. Moore his card and tells her that he would be pleased to give her an engagement if she ever came back East.

The coming of the operatic manager awakens in Grace Moore her slumbering desire for a career. Her husband is averse to her plans, but after months of arguments pro and con, Mrs. Moore leaves her husband and goes East. At their parting the husband plucks a white rose from an arbor and presents it to his wife with the injunction, "Whenever you can return to me as pure as this rose, my heart and my home are open to you."

Later, after a thrilling adventure with a claim-jumper, the husband, who strikes gold, begins to feel the influence of the rose—the pressed rose which saved his life—an interesting by-play in the story. The wife away East wins success and fame as an opera singer—but her happiness is not complete. She feels the call of the rose. The husband comes East, and in a pathetic scene which takes place in a café, the two are re-united.

WHEN THE LEAVES FALL (June 18).—Yvette, the popular favorite of the Italian Opera Company, is in the opening scene of this picture singing Gluck's "Orpheus" when she is suddenly seized with illness, which causes her to fall prostrate on the floor and the audience is completely grief-stricken. Some of the more thoughtful ones, however, rushed to her assistance, among whom were the first violinist and the Marquis of Montreville, both of whom prove to be madly infatuated with the cantatrice.

The Marquis, realizing the extent of the singer's illness, offers his country estate at the seaside and, inasmuch as her physicians prescribe absolute rest and change of atmosphere, Yvette gladly accepts.

During her absence from the opera the first violinist found life quite intolerable. Desiring to see her, he pays a visit to the country estate of the Marquis, only to be refused admission at the door. As a retort to this insult the musician proposes a duel with the Marquis, who, believing it an opportunity to rid himself of the rivalry of the fellow for the hand of Yvette, gladly takes him up. The duel takes place in the courtyard of the estate and results in the death of the violinist.

Shortly before his end, however, the latter picks up his violin and draws out the desolate, mournful strains of the opera "Orpheus." The sickly Yvette from her window recognizes the tune and, seating herself alongside of the casement, looks out only to recognize that her musician admirer has been mortally wounded. Yvette passes away in the arms of the Marquis, who has come to claim her as his bride.

BELLS OF PARADISE (June 20).—Francesca Teresina, the beautiful daughter of a rich Florentine patrician, has been low for many months. In fact there has been practically no improvement in her condition at all and the doctor deems it best to advise her family of her impending death. The last chill months of the Italian winter are fleeting rapidly by when the physician announces to the anxious and saddened family: "Excepting a miracle, she will not hear the bells at Easter."

The Teresina home is cast in the most pitiable gloom, which soon claims and dispirits every member of the household. The mother spends every idle moment that she can at the cathedral praying for the recovery of her loved one or kneeling at her bedside.

Sandrino, Francesca's brother, a year or two her senior, is sorrowfully troubled at the grievous outlook and broods unceasingly over his sadness. One evening, while passing through the courtyard, he chanced to meet Benedetta, his sweetheart, and unburdens his tale of woe upon this gentle, sympathetic creature who, in girlhood, had spent many days with the dying girl and now that they have both grown up to womanhood still persists in her devoted friendship. The sad intelligence that Francesca cannot live is shared equally in sorrow and pain by Benedetta, who had hoped to be united closer to her girl companion through her likely marriage to Sandrino. The situation proves too tragic for the faithful little sweetheart, and after thinking over many plans of saving her comrade, finally decides to give up her chance of marriage, and vows if only Francesca be spared to hear the bells of Easter that she will enter the convent of San Felice and become a nun. At the same time, she communicates her oath to her lover who, loyal as he is to his sister, is nevertheless still more sorely grieved, inasmuch as now whichever way the matter turns he must necessarily suffer a forfeit. Should Francesca recover, he must then lose Benedetta, or if the Almighty allow him Benedetta then it must be at the loss of his own dear sister. Poor Sandrino is most completely unhappy and ponders inconsolably upon either terrible alternative.

As Easter approaches, the Teresinas find great reason to rejoice. Francesca is regaining her health at a rapid and unpredicted rate, which delights both her parents and the anxious doctor. But Sandrino alone is disconsolate. The delicate, convalescing sister is sorely puzzled at Sandrino's perpetual sadness. She recalls the fondness and affection with which he always regarded her and cannot explain his present indifference. She is completely baffled, but determines to discover the cause at all costs.

That night she tosses very restlessly on her bed, watching every moment for the first opportunity to escape from the vigil of her nurse. The occasion presents itself during the dampest hours of early morning, and Francesca in her eagerness steals from her covers and, clad only in her nightrobe, invades the room of her brother, where she discovers a letter from Benedetta, explaining to Sandrino her vow to become a nun if his sister be spared her life. The revelation completely upsets the weakening Francesca and she hastens back to the warm covering of her bed only after suffering fatal attacks of chills.

The next day is Easter. So well has the patient been of late and so steady her improvement that the Teresina family, mother and son, enter the chamber of Francesca to bid her the greetings of the holy day, hoping to take her to the cathedral to worship. Noticing that she is not awake they cautiously cover her bed with Easter lilies, ferns and Italian Spring flowers, taking care not to disturb her placid sleep, but alack! the horror, the mother discovers her daughter's body a deathly cold.

The doctor is called. He examines the body, but its life has fled—Francesca is no more. The miserable Sandrino is prostrated. He opens the shades to allow the sun to stream into the room of death. This discloses the bells in yon belfry, swaying to and fro, pealing their Eastern morning song, but Francesca hears them not. Their notes are changed from joy to dolor. The Teresinas have suffered an irreparable loss.

AUTO SMASH-UP (June 25).—The Danglade homestead has been one of purest happiness throughout the married life of its occupants until they receive a visit from their old friend Mabel Morton, who had recently sought separation from her husband in the courts and obtained it. At the time the case was tried public sentiment leaned in favor of her husband and she was declaimed as notoriously trouble-making. She decided to test her wiles and to try out her charms on Mr. Danglade. She soon comes between husband and wife and brings an end to the happiness that has so long characterized their home. Danglade proves susceptible to her flattery and soon is responsible for great grief and woe to his lovely wife. She, hoping that his fascinations would prove short-lived, waits patiently for a turn to the better. One day, while entertaining Mabel Morton in his touring car, Danglade meets with an accident. He drives his machine over the boundaries of the road and precipitates it and its occupants down a sharp decline. Mabel is only slightly wounded. The machine is wrecked and he is seriously hurt. He is brought to his home, where his wife does all in her power to save him, but the doctor extends no hope of recovery. Mrs. Danglade ministers to her husband throughout his long confinement, but decides that as soon as he regains his health she will leave him. He, however, is brought to his senses by the accident. He realizes the magnitude of the outrage he has committed against his wife and asks for her forgiveness, but she finds it very hard to condone all past injustices. He pleads and promises to reform, so she takes him back. As agreed, he directs a letter to his enamorata, Miss Morton, acquainting her with the truth—that the accident has taught him the virtues of his wife and led to their reconciliation.

Chicago, Illinois,

Gentlemen:-

After using your screen for several months, I wish to add my testimony to that which I have seen in several published letters from your customers in different parts of the country.

Were it only for the gratification expressed by my patrons as to the comfort and ease with which they viewed the pictures at my theatre, without the tiresome eye strain, which they encountered in other theatres, I would be more than repaid, but in addition to this, I find financial returns from the fact that there is no portion of my house which the spectators shun on account of not being able to obtain a satisfactory view of the pictures. They find one seat just as good as another, whether it be in the front row or at the extreme rear of the house, and we are not annoyed by our visitors frequently exchanging seats, endeavoring to find a location from which they may view the pictures continuously without injurious effect upon the eyes.

You certainly have a winner, and we congratulate you and thoroughly recommend your screens to any of our brother exhibitors who have screen troubles, or who are aggravated by ghosts, glimmers, or focus difficulties. You undoubtedly are entitled to their co-operation as having accomplished what everyone connected with the moving picture interests have desired to do.

With best wishes for your success, I am,

Yours very truly,

J. H. Stamper Jr.

The "Perfection Concave Screen"

has made good on every claim we make for it.

We have dozens of letters from others who are using our screen, just as strong as the above, and have not received an adverse criticism from any source.

With such proof as this, are you not satisfied that it is the Screen for your use?

Send us a description of your needs and let us give you further information and quote you.

"Silver Your Curtain With Silverit"

Silverit is a silver paste. It is rubbed on the curtain with a rag and can be polished like a mirror. No laps or streaks. A child can apply it. Increases your picture 100% over aluminum or silver applied with a brush. Makes your curtain a pearl white.

1 Lb. covers a curtain 9 x 12.
1 Lb. can, $3.00; 2 Lb. can, $5.00.

A. G. Thomas, 1705 Fairacres Ave., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. Lone Operator:

Keep the Crank Turning. Our Rewinder Set Needs only that other hand to get busy; one hand slips the reels on and off the inclined spindles and adjusts the film tension while running; the gears unmesh automatically and the handle stops in the same place, so you can grab it in the dark, while the handle adjusted to the long position has a pull like a politician for defeating the film cleaner. Nothing but praise to date. Its users know it's best now. You'll know it some day. Price $5.00 for set. Absolute satisfaction or money back. Postal brings leaflet.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, or $3.50 by registered mail, prepaid, the following: 24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address

" IN THE NAME OF THE LAW "

A WOMAN'S WAY

The new woman-sheriff of Buckskin county, after making several arrests, is shot by a desperate bandit. Her daughter, learning of the trouble, volunteers to act as sheriff. Single handed she ventures to the bandit's hut, and compels him to surrender. Much to her horror he proves to be Dick, her lover. After having him put in prison she ignores his plea for liberty, explaining that she must do her duty and he must take the consequence of his wrong doing.

THE IMP FOLLOWS UP ITS BIG SCOOP

The Imp's big government scoop, "Making United States Currency" (released June 22) is to be followed immediately with another every bit as good. This will be

"Printing and Engraving U. S. Government Stamps"

and will be part of the Imp split release of Saturday, July 6th. Our first government picture shows the process of washing, engraving, printing and counting billions of dollars. It's never been shown before. Our second shows the printing, perforating and cutting of postage and commercial stamps. All the other interesting operations are shown. You will be intensely interested in it yourself. SO WILL YOUR PATRONS. Book it quick and boost it with all your might. On the same reel you will get

"Home Again"

One of the comedies of the year. If you don't get a good laugh out of this, take something for your liver!

"Betty the Coxswain"

An exciting story of college days. At a critical moment, just before the big race, a college boy is injured. His sweetheart takes his place and rows to victory.

"Love, War and a Bonnet"

Released Monday, July 1. This is a California Imp in which a corking good story is staged and enacted in a corking good way. If you've had any of the previous California Imps no argument is necessary.

2 Reels "The Holy City" 2 Reels

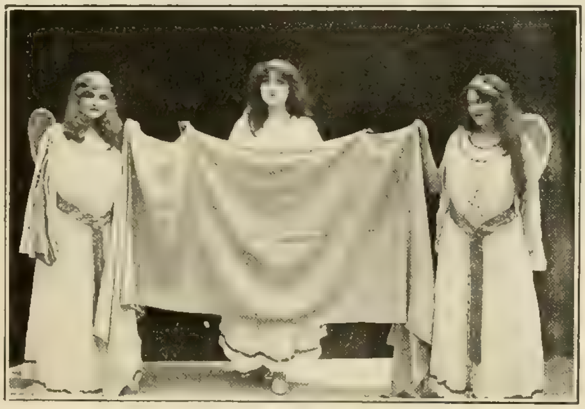
A Biblical masterpiece founded on the American hymn, "THE HOLY CITY," showing the scenes described therein.

One of the remarkable scenes shown in this subject is the city of Jerusalem rising out of the ocean. It overwhelms the spectator with scene after scene of wonderment.

A minister is shown falling asleep and dreaming of the Holy City. Closely following the lines of the hymn, which are used as sub-titles and faithfully followed, the scenes mentioned are presented.



"The Holy City" will take precedence as the greatest Biblical subject produced, being the first attempt to cover on a large scale such a tremendous number of incidents, which are presented in a wonderful manner. The costumes and settings are accurate, and the whole is the result of many months of patient effort and enormous cost.

"The Colonel's Peril"

One Reel Released Saturday, June 29 One Reel

A big feature, with heavy cast and stirring scenes. The colonel breaks up a love affair of his son and sends him to college. The youth runs away and enlists in the army. Later he is assigned to his father's post, but the colonel refuses to recognize him as his son. In a terrific battle with the Indians the son heroically saves his father's life and wins his forgiveness.

"His Message"

One Reel Released Tuesday, June 25 One Reel

Crippled by a landslide, the young prospector is attacked by thieves. While his sweetheart makes a wild ride to the settlement he fights for his life. Dying, he throws a bag of gold in the water, and with his own blood writes a message on a rock after the thieves have left him telling of his action. The posse captures the desperadoes after a sensational pursuit.

Coming! "CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT" Coming!

Three Reels

The most comprehensive and thrilling reproduction of a battle ever produced in the entire history of motography, faithfully following the government records and recognized historical authorities. The hordes of Indians and large bodies of soldiers in action battling, charging, executing military maneuvers under fire, the great massacre scene, the retreat of Major Reno across the Little Big Horn river with the men fighting for their lives in the water, following the stirring incidents which led to the heroic sacrifice which plunged a whole nation in mourning, present a fascinating, blood-stirring subject that will attract millions into the theaters that exhibit it. The release of this picture has been withheld for the purpose of enabling exchanges to arrange with exhibitors for the renting of it. Exhibitors should therefore lose no time in telling their exchanges whether or not they wish bookings on "Custer's Last Fight" as the demand will be enormous.

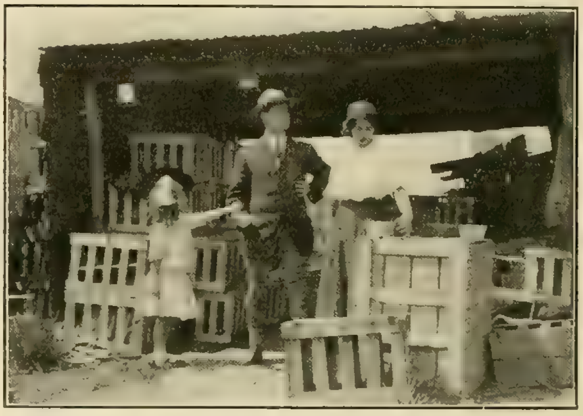
"THERE'S A REASON"

We've stolen the line, but it applies to this ad a great deal more than it does to Postum. There's a reason for using it — even if it's just to Post-'em!

There's a reason for keeping your eye on Gem. "The Princess of Lorraine" and "Hill Folks" were pretty good logic, and George O. Nicholls will provide a different reason every week.



The tale of a struggle and a victory, and the might of a mite.

"THE REASON"

Released Tuesday, June 25th, will convince you!

"The Reason" is a child. A woman not its mother is the cause, and the kid is the because. The tot is the reason the story ends the way it does. If you want to know why we're bragging, get "The Reason." It's a living argument!

THE NEW PHYSICIAN

Jack Harrison and his sweetheart, Helen Stuart, have a little tiff. Each go their respective way, Jack to take charge of a small-town hospital and Helen to work in the city as a nurse. The new physician being very good looking, creates a sensation in the town and many of the girls suddenly become sick so that they may be taken to the hospital and be near him. Helen, however, turns up and quickly puts an end to the ruse.

Released Thursday, June 27th, 1912

From Fireman to Engineer

Steve Reardon, a fireman on a yard engine, is trying hard to win promotion and also to win Molly, the roadmaster's daughter. One day the Superintendent's little girl pays a visit to the yard, climbs on an engine and playing with the throttle starts a runaway. Steve knocks the engineer of a limited off his engine, uncouples it, starts in chase and captures the runaway. He brings it and the child back to safety and wins an engine and sweetheart.

Released Monday, July 1st, 1912. Length about 1000 ft.

THE SPOILED CHILD

A pretty story showing the mistake of encouraging a family favorite. Raymond Harrold is a manly little fellow and suffers much for the perversity of his younger brother. Albert, however, in the end redeems himself by offering cuticle to save his brother's life, who has been severely burned.

Released Friday, June 28th, 1912. Lengh 321 ft.

BRIDGET'S EXPLANATION

Professor Jolson has secured a pair of Phœnician Bowls which are priceless. With much pride he invites a number of friends and critics to view the same. After an elaborate lecture, he invites his guests to retire to another room, instructing his housemaid to use unusual care of his treasures. Presently a crash is heard and the Professor and his friends rush to the room. Jolson, in his fury, asks the girl how she broke the bowl, and she illustrates by dropping the other.

Length 732 feet

THE TRAMP ELEPHANT

Three hoboes arrive in their special box car and note that there is a circus in town. One of the cars is sidetracked and open. They enter and find a property elephant. Two of them promptly insert themselves in the prop and the third dresses as a keeper. Thus arrayed they go forth to give a show by themselves. They are promptly discovered and chased, but drive the police and crowd away by the elephant squirting a bucket of water from his trunk, and escape.

Released Saturday, June 29th, 1912. Length 1050 feet

WHAT THE DRIVER SAW

The driver of Cab 11 by peeping through the trap in the top of his hansom is able to circumvent a scheme by which a bogus Lord has induced Mrs. Roberts to give her daughter. Being engaged to carry the party to the minister, he drives them to a rendezvous where little May meets Harry Nugent, her true lover, and the imposter and Ma are badly disappointed.

ON AND AFTER JUNE 28th WE WILL RELEASE FIVE PHOTO-PLAYS EACH WEEK.

VITAGRAPH

"THE EXTENSION TABLE" Monday, June 24th

Accommodates itself to all comers. Everybody who gathers 'round it is happy. Quite different from the table built for two. It promotes love and unity where discord sat with gloom and despair.

"NEVER AGAIN" } A Comedy
"THE CARPATHIA" } The Titanic Rescue Ship Tuesday, June 25th

This is a double portion of good things. The first tells of a fellow who tells another fellow to make love to the first pretty girl he meets. She happens to be the first fellow's wife. The second number on this reel takes us aboard the Carpathia, where we meet Captain Rostron and his brave crew. They show us how to launch the life boats and take us all over the ship.

"WHEN ROSES WITHER" Wednesday, June 26th

This never withers or loses its sweetness. A good old-fashioned mother tires of the restraints and artificiality of society. She returns to her old home in the country and dies happy, amid its hallowed associations.

"PSEUDO SULTAN" Friday, June 28th

Laughable how some men get in a position they can't fill. Bunny tries to work a bluff. In the show-down he is found wanting. He has to give up his dream of the harem, his power of office and comes within an ace of giving up his life. He has a narrow escape.

"AT THE END OF THE TRAIL" Saturday, June 29th

Keep after it and you are bound to get it. A Western sheriff, although wounded by his quarry, keeps after his man until he lands him in jail. He trails him to the end and gets him.

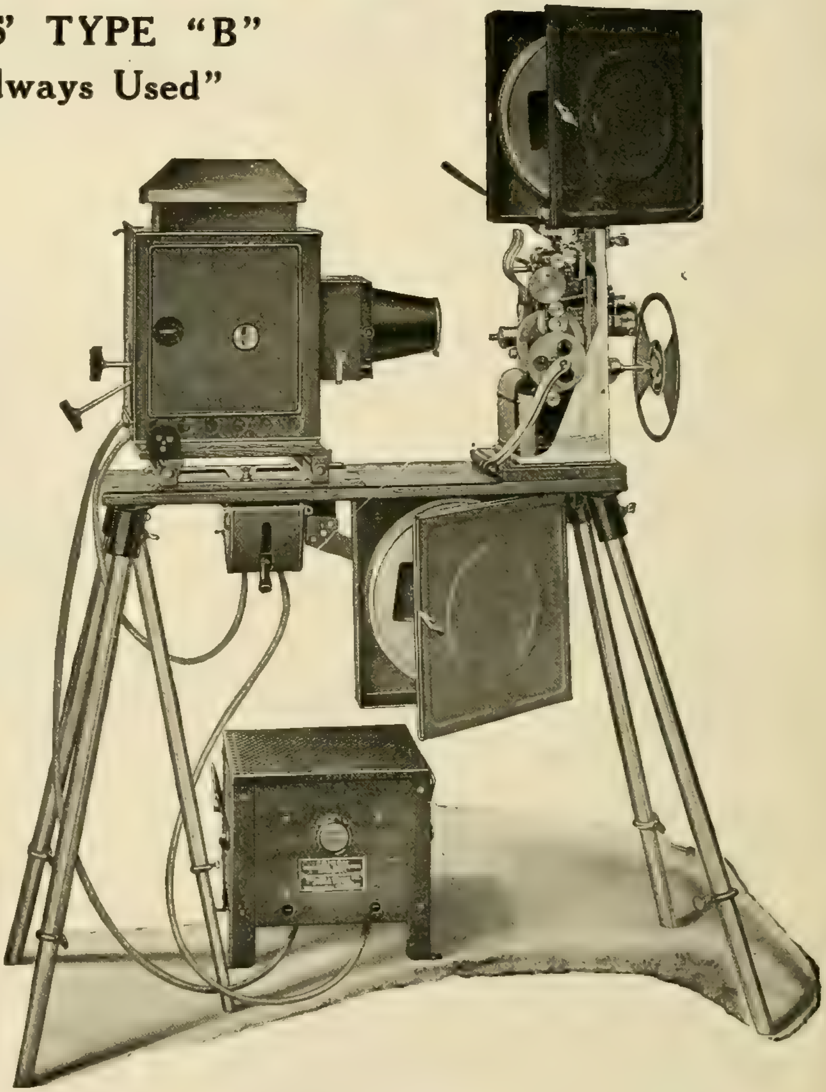
THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

UNDERWRITERS' TYPE "B"

"Once Used, Always Used"



Your success in the motion picture business depends on the degree of amusement and satisfaction you give your patrons.

The flickering pictures and frequent interruptions for repairs that are characteristic of a cheap machine are also discouraging to an audience.

The Edison Kinetoscope has had the advantage of all of Thomas A. Edison's study and improvements. There is no unpleasant flicker, no wear on the films, no danger from fire, no complicated mechanism. The Edison builds patronage and keeps it. Ask us for a catalog and a copy of the Edison Kinetogram.

Facts and Comments

OUR European friends of the daily press are close rivals for the misrepresentation, willful or ignorant, of the workings and achievements of the motion picture—hence the necessity of starting and financing a special campaign against newspaper libels, of which we spoke in a recent issue of The Moving Picture World. Capping the climax comes a long article in a Parisian paper, strongly intimating that the late desperate fight and death of some auto bandits in the French capital were arranged and staged by a producer of films with a fearful hankering after the dreadfully realistic. It is set forth in the article that the chief of the bandits had made a bargain with a manufacturer of motion pictures and that in the excess of professional enthusiasm the auto bandits overdid the thing; the police imagined that the performances of the bandits were the real thing and interfered and that before the truth became known the fight had grown to such proportions that it came to a quick and tragic end. Evidently no tale is too absurd for the daily press, if it serves the purpose of degrading the motion picture in the eyes of the public.

COMPLAINTS have recently been heard among exhibitors that the comic end of the releases is being neglected in the rush to produce great features. Whether there is any foundation for this belief or not, it is certain that the public cannot be expected to subsist on an exclusive diet of features. Features are splendid and will increase in demand and popularity, but not everybody is in a position to turn out that kind of features—not just yet. This rush to imitate whatever is successful has nothing to commend it. There are companies with special facilities for the turning out of good comics, and it would be well if they kept to that kind of work. Originality is the thing the public desires most. A special aptitude for certain lines of work ought to be cultivated to the uttermost. It is a grave mistake to imitate the other fellow's work just because it is for the moment successful. Imitation is hard work and the most thankless of all labors.

AT this late day, when State prisons, reform schools, insane asylums and other public institutions are installing the moving picture for the benefit of their inmates, we are obliged to observe the ludicrous spectacle of a Hartford, Conn., judge roaring out from the bench that moving pictures are filling the jails with youthful criminals, both male and female. As matters stand, either the penal institutions or the learned Hartford judge is making a mistake in regard to moving pictures. Inasmuch as more penal institutions are installing motion picture outfits day by day, and as fewer judges are attacking the motion picture day by day, we can best leave it to the reader to draw his own conclusions as to the high status of the picture at this time. Will the learned Hartford judge change his opinion? He will not. He may change from Democrat to Republican, or vice versa, to get his judicial job, but we might as well expect a National League umpire to reverse his decision as to expect such a great judicial mind to rescind its dyspeptic fiat. The die is cast. No use to call his attention to motion pictures in the public schools of New York, Chicago and elsewhere. Nothing avails it now to mention churches and Y. M. C. A. institutions that have come to recognize the motion picture as their friend and helper. Simon says, "Thumbs down." The occasion of this great judicial utterance was while the judge was fining half the exhibitors of Hartford for violating the children's age law, a law that the most innocent and most law-abiding moving picture man is liable to violate unconsciously at any time. The Hartford judge went on to say that he considered the moving picture show as being more demoralizing than the saloon. He did not tell where he stands on the saloon question.

THE Moving Picture World notes with great satisfaction the organization of the exhibitors of the State of New York. Though first in wealth and population the Empire State has so far been without an organization. When the Legislature of the State at its last session started a campaign against the motion picture there was no organized protest against all the proposed more or less iniquitous measures from any organized body of exhibitors. If it had not been for the presidential campaign casting its shadows before some or all of these bad bills might have become laws. As far as we know The Moving Picture World was the only part of the industry which went to the trouble of asking to be notified of the hearings in committees. We may be reasonably sure that these bills, which were not defeated but merely died of inanition, will come before the next legislature of the State. It is on the cards that a vigorous legislative campaign against Sunday exhibitions will be prosecuted. We hope that the organized exhibitors of the State will be in Albany ready to meet the arguments of the Sabbatarians. 1913 will be an off year politically and looks promising in the matter of "strike" bills.

IN most European countries the authorities levy a special tax on every film shown. This tax is a survival of the old sumptuary laws. The original object of the tax was to discourage people from enjoying themselves. In some part of Europe this tax is well-nigh prohibitive. We are glad to note that no such tax is levied on films which even with a liberal interpretation may be termed educational. On purely educational films, whose value is recognized by all, it would be well to exact no tariff duties whatever. We do not mean to include scenic pictures in this category, but such pictures of scientific character which really contain valuable information.

THE recruiting offices of the United States Navy and Army are fully alive to the possibilities of the motion picture as "a persuader." A valued correspondent writes to us from New Orleans that at two moving picture theaters in that city officers from the local recruiting station came to lecture on the subjects "Ten Days with a Fleet of United States Battleships" and "Target Practice." In the words of our correspondent: "We believe that this is a circumstance of note—bound to do good for the motion picture in general. The local naval recruiting officers have expressed themselves very favorably as to this plan for interesting the young men of this country in our navy." We may add to this remark of our correspondent that these pictures, interesting as they surely must be, can be made doubly interesting and doubly useful by a lecture delivered by a competent speaker. This, indeed, is true of every film with any pretence to educational value. The lecture in such cases adds a hundred per cent. Instruction of any kind is then most effective when the instructor addresses himself to the ears as well as to the eyes of his auditors.

FRANK KEENAN, who for thirty-two years has been an actor on the so-called "legitimate" stage, expresses his firm belief that the future of the drama, instead of being dark by reason of the influence of the motion picture, was never brighter than it is to-day. He points out that the cheap melodrama of other days did not injure the attendance on the better grade of plays; he says that as a matter of fact the public taste was sharpened for better and higher things. The veteran player suggests that the immense additions to the clientele of amusement purveyors will, as education progresses, become less satisfied with the silent screen and demand what he describes as the "superior grade of dramatic representation."

Mr. Keenan overlooks one essential factor: he assumes, or we have a right to conclude that he assumes, that the art of the silent stage is to stand still; he fails to recognize the fact, of which we have abundant and accumulative evidence, that the motion picture is advancing in rapid and yet in orderly sequence. It is advancing in nicety of mechanical appliances; in the skill, in the artistic training of its players; in the quality, in the rank, of the stage people who are being attracted to it by the increased emoluments and public favor; in the magnitude of its attractions, and in the technique and artistic perception of those who direct the productions. Knowledge gained on the speaking stage has been of vast importance to the screen; but the wonderful facilities of the silent stage for pictorial presentation will, in turn, have their influence on the "legitimate" and compel increased attention to the staging of dramatic productions.

Ignorance vs. Knowledge

By W. H. Jackson

WHAT a strange thing is ignorance! It is found everywhere. Sometimes it is misrepresented as being only found in places of the lowly, the poor and the unfortunate. This is because of lack of definition. Ignorance is "lack of knowledge," and consequently wherever there is this "lack" there is that state of deficiency which the wise seek to remedy. Lack of knowledge only becomes culpable ignorance when any one has the audacity to express himself with authority upon that about which he knows nothing. Other evils of this ignorance are prejudice and unjust criticism by those assuming to know, and yet really they do not.

This great fault is found in high places, such as editorial offices of the newspapers, council chambers of the lawmakers, board rooms of benevolent societies, and even in the debates of political clubs.

It is astonishing to note how the moving picture business in all its branches is treated by each of the above mentioned parties. To read some of their opinions, criticisms and advices would be as amusing as a comic paper, if it were not for the serious results attending the outcome of the various suggestions.

To read some of their opinions, the moving pictures are agents of evil and moving picture people of a questionable character, and all ought to be harnessed by censorship and other equally forcible restraints, as to make them as incapable of freedom of action as a man in a straitjacket; this is the result of that "lack of knowledge," fit only to be called ignorance.

Where the light of knowledge has shed its revealing rays, the moving picture is regarded as one of the greatest agencies for good in the world to-day—nay, further, —peculiar to this subject—the cinematograph is the greatest, most thorough, most widespread disseminator of knowledge the world has ever known. Consequently, it is also the world's greatest destroyer of ignorance.

While there are many who are now reluctantly compelled to admit this, they cannot get rid of their former lack of knowledge and its effects, but seek with their partial and limited attainments in this direction to advise and control the government of that about which they know so little.

How thoroughly this unfortunate ignorance would be dispelled if these people were readers of the representative organ of the whole moving picture interests. Even those interested in moving pictures admit that they would be at every disadvantage but for the Moving Picture World. If this be so, why cannot the advantages thus offered be more widespread?

It is not reasonable to expect that other than those actively engaged in the moving picture business can be subscribers to a trade paper. This does not, however, prevent those who should be better informed from being readers of this American exponent of cinematography. There is not a single subscriber to any acknowledged organ of his business or profession who can fail to improve the character and reputation of his business by working in harmony with that organ, and doing all in his power to promulgate the views expressed therein.

The columns of the World are constantly publishing letters from correspondents expressing their appreciation of the helpfulness of the suggestions which come to them through its pages. Let it not be forgotten that, while that helpfulness is classified, the editorial is of special importance, for it is here that public opinion is educated and molded, and proper sentiments expressed, for the all-round good of truly valuable moving picture work and its effects. The more widely the Moving Picture World is read, the more effective will be the good work which all engaged in the moving picture business are aiming for, and subscribers can best help their own cause by bringing to the attention of authorities like those mentioned at the beginning of this article, this true knowledge concerning the whole moving picture business. This is not presenting precept without example; the writer of this article is so situated that it has often fallen to his lot to enlighten many a dark critic, always with good results. Indeed, it is worth while mentioning that a New York newspaper ceased its unjust attacks on the moving pictures after becoming acquainted with the Moving Picture World and its principles, feeling that if exhibitors and others acted in harmony with their trade paper, the public had little to fear.

Let your trade paper be known to those who know it not, and it will impart that knowledge so necessary for your advance, and drive away that ignorance which enthralls and hinders you, and give greater freedom to true moving picture prosperity.

Indirect Federal Censorship

By W. Stephen Bush

A VERY grave and very real danger threatens the interests of the moving picture art and industry. In both houses of Congress bills have been introduced which, if enacted into laws, will subject every person engaged in the making or exhibiting of motion pictures to possible and even probable persecution in the future; persecution which will have all the power of the federal government behind it and against which redress in the most favorable of cases could only come after long delay and the expenditure of vast sums of money.

The first of these objectionable bills was introduced in the House of Representatives on May 29th by Mr. Roddenbery, and was immediately referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Here is the text of the Roddenbery bill.

> Sec. 1—It shall be unlawful to send or receive by mail, railway, express, water service or in any other manner from any state, territory or the District of Columbia to any other state, territory or the District of Columbia or to bring into this country from any foreign country any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists under whatever name or any record or account of betting on the same. That it shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mails for mailing or delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier for carriage, from one state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or to bring or to cause to be brought into the United States from abroad, any film or other pictorial representation of any prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used or may be used for purposes of public exhibition, or any record or account of betting on the same.
> Sec. 2—That it shall be unlawful for any person to take or receive from the mails, or any express company or other common carrier, with intent to sell, distribute, circulate, or exhibit any matter or thing herein forbidden to be deposited for mailing, delivery, or carriage in interstate commerce.
> Sec. 3—That any person violating any of the provisions of this Act may be proceeded against by indictment and tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter was deposited for mailing or carriage, or to which it is carried, or in which it is delivered; and any person violating any of the provisions of this Act shall for each and every offense, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than one thousand dollars or sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

On June 8th the bill was reported favorably out of committee with a recommendation that the first section be eliminated. The report then goes on to say:

> Nearly all the states of the Union forbid prize fights by state laws. This bill simply protects the more advanced states which have forbidden pugilism as brutal and brutalizing against having prize fights brought into their borders by way of moving picture shows, which are only a little less harmful than the degrading sport which they describe.
> This bill does not forbid, nor attempt to forbid, statements of prize fights by newspapers as a matter of news.
> This bill is in accord with another act of Congress forbidding the interstate transportation of obscene pictures, and we submit that the effects of the brutality of pugilism are hardly less harmful to our youth.
> This bill calls for immediate consideration, for manifest reasons not necessary to be given in detail in this report.

The bill is now on the House Calendar and may be called up on motion at any time. The same bill in all respects was fathered in the Senate by Senator Simmons and is in exactly the same status on its journey toward becoming a law.

No one will suspect The Moving Picture World of being partial to the promotion of prize fight films. We honestly believe that the noble art of cinematography can be put to better uses than the reproduction of two brutes pummeling each other for the delectation of a lot of other brutes. When we, therefore, protest most emphatically against the proposed passage of a bill in the Federal Senate laying an interstate commerce embargo on prize fight films we do so, not because we hold a brief for prize fight pictures, but because we believe that the principle of the Simmons bill is vicious and would in effect lead to a veritable persecution of people interested in the business of making and exhibiting moving pictures. We believe that the principle of all such legislation is vicious and will eventually lead to an indirect, but most oppressive and unjust censorship of films. If the principle of this legislation is extended the Congress of the United States will eventually become a censor in the old historic sense of the word, i. e., an inspector and supervisor of public morality. If Congress has power to legislate in this manner it may appoint its Federal censors all over the United States and install a complicated machinery to enforce the edicts of the censors.

It will be easy to find distinguished jurors by the score willing to assure us that such legislation constitutes a usurpation of power on the part of Congress and is unconstitutional. Under our system of government the question, "When is a law not a law?" can only be decided after the courts have passed on its constitutionality. If this proposed legislation passes both Houses of Congress it would have to be fought in the courts. At the best it would mean a great expenditure of money. It is not likely that the interests behind these prize fight films are in a position to buy high-priced legal talent and then wait a year or more for a final decision. The principle of indirect Federal censorship thus invoked against the prize fight film to-day might be made to apply to any other picture to-morrow.

We cannot stop to point out the numerous contradictions in the proposed bills and the inconsistencies in the report of the house committee. If "public morality," upon which alone the enactment of such bills could be defended, is injured through moving pictures why is it not equally injured through pictorial representations of a prize fight in the newspapers. The "slangy" and enthusiastic descriptions of such events in the newspapers are surely just as shocking as the moving pictures. The root of this evil of discriminating against the moving pictures must be attacked by enfranchising the motion picture and placing it on an equal footing with the newspapers before the law. The Moving Picture World has time and again emphasized this fact.

It seems to us that the National Organization of Exhibitors might take an interest in this important matter and take some action without any more delay than can be helped. In such a situation as this the value of the ounce of prevention must be apparent to all who are interested in the rights and the welfare of the motion picture.

TOM SAXE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. Thomas Saxe, secretary of the Saxe Amusement Enterprises of Milwaukee and other Western cities, paid the New York office of the Moving Picture World a short visit the other day. Mr. Saxe is a pioneer in the exclusive high-class picture theaters in the West. His Milwaukee enterprises have been frequently noted in the columns of the Moving Picture World. Mr. Saxe said that he had recently secured control of the Lyric heater, Minneapolis, Minn., made famous by S. L. Rothapfel and had also added another Milwaukee house to his list. High class houses and high class entertainments are Mr. Saxe's specialties.

The Future of the Photodrama

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THE Director, to begin at the end, is and has ever been the omnipotent force in thousand-foot production of photo reels. Perhaps he invested money in the business! He may have been an actor! He might have designed costumes and painted scenes! Some have started as manipulators of electric lights! It is even possible that his wife is an accomplished actress! He must have some qualifications to be where he is and more than one to stay there, for any man compelled to turn out fifty-two playlets a year earns every dollar he receives, but he has his limitations—he is only a human being—and it looks as though he will be up against an entirely different or much more difficult proposition in the original photodrama of full-grown proportions.

The big feature-plays of the hour are not even shadows of coming events, but mere reflections of what is past and gone; they are borrowed from ancient and modern literature and serve either to partially illustrate or temporarily revive interest in past performances. To those members of a mixed audience at the moving picture show who have covered a wide range of literature in their studies these adaptations are often entertaining and more rarely revelations, and to many of those whose knowledge is less complete there is intellectual stimulus where intense interest is aroused, but the printed stories of other days so seldom lend themelves to vivid dramatic construction that a majority of people in front find it difficult to keep track of the action if indeed their sympathies are aroused.

These attempts to improve on the thousand-foot productions are often favorably criticised because they represent steps in the natural evolution of the New Art. Producers and directors are making creditable efforts to respond to a demand. Let us proceed along these lines if we must, but it is just as well for us to bear in mind that all this work, both practical and artistic, is leading upward towards original creations of beauty and genius in conformity with the progressive tendency of our times. We are not going to stay where we are any more than we stayed where we were.

Now the customary thing has been for some inside or outside playwright to provide the threads of a plot, mere figments of the imagination, and for the director to weave these into marketable calico patterns, something like those sold in the country stores when the farmer drove to town astride the pole of a wagon—good old homespun fabrics, where the hero was wrongly accused of committing the crime, was saved by the girl, and embraced her in the last act. For over a quarter of a century that farmer has been using costly harvesters and automatic twine binders, and he is now whirling down to the station in a six-cylinder car to receive his daughter fresh from Vassar, or his son just back from the scientific school with new ideas about tilling the soil.

What manlier types have we than those who are using brain and brawn in bringing the balance of trade to this country? But actor and director still represent them in chin whiskers and cowhide boots, the weak-minded butts of slapstick pleasantry. How are these theatrical gentlemen going to present existing conditions, to say nothing of great future problems, after years of adherence to stale tradition and impotent imitation? This thing of playing down to a handful of hobble-brained hee-haws in the moving picture theaters is getting on the nerves of those who can afford to go every day and would be glad to do so if they were intelligently entertained.

The last shall be first. There is little use in discussing the actor and the playwright until those largely responsible for the productions now being released are critically examined. I include with them company officers who participate in the exercise of selective taste—by their works ye shall know them. The future of the photodrama largely depends upon those who pick the plays. It, however, lies in the power of a director to make or mar a good drama; on his intelligence and training depends the finished result; he is the man who must first rise to the occasion.

Many of those who are now at work will be among the great directors of the future because they will have put behind them such details as the creation of scenes and distribution of parts, and they will have acquired the knack of making dream pictures in advance of the real ones, so that the stage is figuratively cleared for the artistic presentation of the dramatist's ideas. The profound study during action is that applied to what is "going over," but the most intense application of an ambitious director's mind must be made to the length and breadth of the conception involved in the big photodrama itself.

What is the idea involved? Any talented author can state his proposition at the outset. Is the idea in accord with the spirit of the times? It may be progressive! It may be prophetic! It may be one which will get a strong grip on universal sympathy and lift us a little, or help us a little, or cheer us a little! It may solve an ethical problem in the guise of an entertainment! Is there a great characterization in the piece? This alone will sometimes carry a photodrama into the masterpiece class. The director of the future will have to be big enough not only to grasp another man's purpose but to enter sympathetically and unselfishly upon its delineation.

The future photodrama that makes a big hit under the right sort of exhibition system will be far more profitable than a dozen small ones of the kind now released, but great popularity cannot be expected for any mere string of incidents stretched from a thousand feet over greater space by amplification. The big story must mean something to attain tremendous success. The New Art must be enriched by original creations of great influence and power.

What will the future photodrama be about?

Whatever is interesting or enjoyable to an intelligent audience.

Whatever modifies our primitive egotism and keeps alive the spiritual fire within us.

Whatever sweetens our dramatic sorrows and struggles and softens our sympathies for one another.

Whatever inspires us to finer effort and thus lights our way out of the dark places of our present social organization.

Whatever ennobles and beautifies human existence of to-day.

From gulf to lakes, from ocean to ocean, we are awaiting, millions of us, waiting, hoping, longing, almost begging, for the grand photodrama of the future.

Thought has leavened the whole unthinking mass
In this new era. We are drawing near Unatlassed boundaries of a larger sphere.

New York State Exhibitors Organize.

PRESIDENT NEFF, OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA ORGANIZES A STATE BRANCH—NEW YORK CITY EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION JOINS IN A BODY—OUT-OF-TOWN VISITORS ENTERTAINED BY THE LOCAL MEMBERS—BIG TIME AT CONEY.

PRESIDENT M. A. NEFF, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, on June 19, in the Union Square Hotel in New York City, organized a New York State branch of the National Association. The meeting was called to order at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and with the exception of a recess for luncheon the session was continuous until five o'clock, when the convention adjourned. Through the courtesy of the New York City Association of Exhibitors, the entire body of delegates were conveyed by automobile to Coney Island for an evening of recreation after a solid day's work.

The proceedings were closely followed by all present, and the deepest interest was manifest at all times. There were no dull moments. President Neff was in the chair until the close of the business session, and to his tact, his urbanity, his generalship and goodfellowship no small credit must be given for the success of the occasion. There was entire harmony throughout the day. In all probability, the next state convention will be held in some city near the center of the state in order to reach the larger number of exhibitors. There was the best reason for holding the initial meeting in New York City, for there already existed in this city an organized, militant body of 117 exhibitors to serve as a nucleus for the state branch.

MR. M. A. NEFF,
President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The speeches of the day were, of course, the feature. President Neff was the first speaker, and he outlined at length the objects of the League and recounted what had been accomplished in other states. Another speaker who was followed with the closest attention was Chief Wallace, of the City Bureau of Licenses.

Among those present from out of town were: E. L. Rushton, Canton; Lew Fischer, Catskill; C. Kihlmire, Saratoga Springs; B. E. Cornell, Syracuse; John C. Davis, Saugerties; Miss Ida Mayer, Jamaica; William Gauthier, Gouverneur; Seymour Warner, Kingston; Charles H. Buck, Oneonta; J. A. Colin, Johnstown; K. M. Austin, Buffalo; E. M. Day, Auburn; S. Luckno, Albany, and R. M. Davidson, Binghamton. Samuel H. Trigger, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, opened the proceedings. "It gives me the greatest pleasure," he said, "to open the first state convention of moving picture exhibitors held in New York. We have a gentleman here of whom you have all heard—one of the men who does things and has come here to continue doing good things for the benefit of the exhibitors. It is unnecessary for me to tell you the benefits to be derived from organization. Not long ago the New York exhibitor was practically put in the same category as a divekeeper. To-day the New York exhibitor is put in the same category as any other business man. Gentlemen, I take pleasure in introducing to you Mr. Neff, the president of the National League."

President Neff's Address.

Mr. Neff was given a hearty reception. "It affords me great pleasure, I assure you, to meet with the New York exhibitors," he said. "For a long time I have been trying to get to New York to meet you and explain our objects—why we think we should keep together for the advancement of the interests of cinematography. To start with, we are in the cleanest business on earth to-day because we are amusing and educating the world. I want to call your attention to a few facts.

"In the state of Ohio, where we formed our first organization, after writing 500 letters and urging through the papers, I secured the large gathering of ten besides myself. In the city where we met, Columbus, there was not one exhibitor that attended the convention. In about three months we had another convention. We had the large gathering of eighteen. At the next meeting we had thirty-five. Then we began to grow.

Exhibitors Hold Great Power.

"You are the greatest power to-day that the world has ever known. You control influences that no other power in the world controls. By means of a screen and a camera you are educating the world. What you want in the State of New York is a strong, vigorous, organization. What you want are active men at the head of it—men who will do things."

Mr. Neff spoke at length of the activities of the Ohio branch and told of the good accomplished by it.

"Now, what you want to do," continued Mr. Neff, "is to organize. New York is a great big city. It is the metropolis of America. We are all proud of the city and of the Empire State. We all look to the East when anything big is doing. You must get together for self-protection and self-preservation. The man who runs films six months old is as necessary to the industry as the man who runs first-day releases."

Should Scrutinize Legislation.

Referring to antagonistic legislation which has in times past been proposed, Mr. Neff said: "If these laws are passed in Albany, how are you going to get relief? You have got to go to Albany for your legislation and for your relief, notwithstanding the power your cities have. The cities can't pass legislation that conflicts with state laws. There are many things you are bothered with. Get your officers and your grievance committee. Then report your troubles to your grievance committee and let it take it up.

"We are here now for the purpose of orgnizing a state league as well as a local. It becomes necessary to ask every man and lady here who owns a picture theater to join this organization, by paying the necessary membership fee of $5, which will go into your own treasury. It is your money."

New York Local Joins in Body.

Arthur D. Jacobs said he had been delegated to make to the meeting a proposition that the city association, being already organized, be admitted for the nominal sum of $100. He stated that there were 117 members in good standing. Mr. Neff favored the proposition, and the meeting accepted the proposal of the city association.

"Every exhibitor that comes into this organization aids and encourages the exhibitors; everyone that stays out is a detriment to exhibitors," said Mr. Neff. "I hope everyone will come in."

The meeting then proceeded to the election of officers, with the following result:

President, Samuel H. Trigger, president of the New York City Association; first vice-president, Bert M. Cornell, Syracuse; second vice-president, R. M. Davidson, Binghamton; secretary, Harold W. Rosenthal, New York; treasurer, John C. Davis, Saugerties; vice-president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Sydney Asher, New York.

To the National Convention at Chicago, August 13-16, the following were elected delegates: Miss Ida Mayer, Jamaica; A. M. Day, Auburn, and Grant W. Anson, New York; alternates, Lewis Rosenthal, Robert Whitten and L. Schwartz, all of New York.

The election of Mr. Trigger was the signal for hearty applause. Responding to calls for remarks, Mr. Trigger referred to the booth question: "We have the confidence of all the civic societies in New York City," he said. He pleaded for a bill that would permit children to go to the picture theaters after school hours. "This proposition is going up to Albany," said President Trigger, "and we want you to put it through. Everything the New York City exhibitors have tried to do they have done. If there is any person that is antagonistic toward motion pictures, from the governor down, you can beat him. I can assure you we will work hard in New York. I will endeavor to show Mr. Neff that when we get a national convention in New York we will possess more members in New York State than he has got in any three states he can name."

Practical Mother Speaks Up.

Mrs. Harry C. Arthur, president of the Practical Mothers' Association, a resident of Bronx Borough, made a hit with the delegates. She is advocating the passage of a state law permitting any child large enough to be on the streets or to run errands to enter picture theaters unaccompanied, between the hours of 2.30 and 6 in the afternoon. As a preliminary to her remarks, Mrs. Arthur qualified for her position by stating that she was the mother of ten living children She further qualified as being in a position to speak with authority on the subject of pictures and children by saying that in her capacity as a mother she had attended picture theaters every other night for eight years. Referring to the "foolish prejudice" that prevailed against admission of children, especially among some who have been educated until they have no more red blood in their veins, and speaking of the great educational value of the screen, Mrs. Arthur said: "What I want to know is—Will the the Exhibitors' Association of New York help the Practical Mother's Association get for the children this educational right? We are entitled to it. Will you help us? Will you let us go into your houses and talk to your people and tell them what we want to do? If you will back this bill we can go next year to Albany and it will go through. If you have confidence in our ability to hold your audiences, then our fight is won for the poor youngsters. The boys and girls want a square deal."

Sydney Asher, following his election as national vice-president, expressed his gratification. He was followed by Deputy Joyce, of Sheriff Harburger's office. Private Secretary Kellar to Superintendent of Buildings Miller, of Manhattan, apologized for the absence of his chief.

Neff Boosts National Meeting.

President Neff here pleaded for full attendance at the national convention in Chicago. He said a special train would be run from the East. He further stated that the entire eighteenth floor of the La Salle Hotel had been engaged. The convention hall holds over a thousand persons; if further accommodation is required there is another hall in the same hotel with a capacity of 500, to say nothing of the roof garden. "We are going to have a grand time," continued Mr. Neff, "boat rides, automobile rides—in fact, they claim in Chicago they will spend $15,000 to entertain you. Chicago desires me to extend a special invitation to New York to come to Chicago and they will show you a good time. Chicago also wants to take that opportunity to convince you that New York's interests are Chicago's interests. I look for from three to five thousand exhibitors at the national convention."

First Woman Delegate.

Miss Ida Mayer, of Jamaica, who is the first woman exhibitor to become a member of the state branch, and who received the highest vote for delegate to the national convention, was the next to speak. She was given an extremely cordial reception. Miss Mayer, who is a finished speaker, told some of her experiences as an exhibitor. She said that with one or two exceptions she had been fairly treated and had never been bothered. "One reason why I am glad to be going with you to Chicago," she said, "is because I want to go deeper into this work. I find so many excellent people who are taking it up. The old-time mercenary days are gone; the time has come for people with large vision to step in. I thank you for this opportunity to take an active part with you in this great work which means so much for the good of every community, and especially for the children."

Ovation for Chief Wallace.

President Neff announced the presence of Chief Wallace of the Bureau of Licenses and also Deputies Rogers of Manhattan and Bracken of Brooklyn. The applause which greeted the statement that Chief Wallace had done more for moving pictures in New York than any other man attested the popularity of the Chief of the Bureau among the exhibitors.

"The exhibitors of New York are doing not only a service to themselves in organizing for the betterment of their business," said the Chief; "they are doing a service to the community. The service which they perform may be in a sense mercenary; it may be in a sense commercial; but in a larger sense it is educational and instructive to the general public. I have always been an advocate of organization among moving picture men. I have often told them they ought to get together and perfect a permanent organization to look after their interests. There are many interests inimical to moving pictures—interests always ready to attack the moving picture when it suits their purpose. It seems to me an organization of five or six hundred men ought to be able to put up a pretty good fight to defend themselves if the occasion required. We all know the agencies which have attempted to handicap the moving picture business. For that reason it behooves you men to band together for protection.

"Your association should refuse to admit to membership a man who does not come up to a certain standard in the manner in which he conducts his business. In that way you will eliminate the undesirable citizens from the moving picture industry. It is a great deal easier for a number of men to band themselves together and adhere to a certain line of conduct. They will not have unfair competition; they will not have illegal competition; they will make it easier for the city officials to put others out of business.

"It has always been my endeavor to meet the moving picture people on common ground. You don't have to have any intermediaries or any intercessors to reach me. Every case is met on its merits. I have tried to stand for a square deal. We have very few kicks from the moving picture people. We do have a few kicks from people opposed to pictures. These are generally people who don't go to shows themselves at all, and protest they would not go into them; and then they proceed to tell you all about them. I recall a clergyman who came to protest against a proposed picture show in the neighborhood of his church. He was one of those who talk of 'dens of vice and sinks of iniquity.' My answer was this: 'If the moving picture show is not patronized by the people who go to your church, it will be a failure.' Shows draw their trade from the local neighborhood, and every show reflects the character and characteristics of its neighborhood. I think, as a general proposition, it is fair to say it is just as good as the neighborhood it is in.

"We have, of course, been working under a severe handicap in this city. Our attempts to make laws for the betterment of your industry have not been entirely successful. [Laughter.] We hope soon to get action on an ordinance now before the Board of Aldermen. If the Board of Aldermen doesn't want to pass that ordinance, let the aldermen get together and make a better one."

Mr. Wallace, in concluding, referred to the License Bureau's inadequate quarters and said at the last session of the Sinking Fund permission was given to lease new quarters.

Deputy Bracken strongly deprecated the practice of some exhibitors giving out coupons. He also suggested that exhibitors keep a strict oversight on their employes. He told of an employe of one picture house who sells cocaine. "If his employer is here, he had better fire him—throw him out," said the deputy, "for we are after him. How many of you pay attention to your singers, inside the hall, and outside after the show's over? I am just mentioning a few knocks, for I can say plenty of good things about your business. Go after these men who are not a credit to your industry. Get them before you at your meetings. Roast them. Don't let them conduct a moving picture business so that the front of their place looks more like a grocery store or a Chinese laundry."

Mr. Neff stated that in Ohio the coupon evil had been squelched by legislation initiated by the league.

Deputy Rogers spoke of the remarkable advance that had been made in the conditions surrounding the picture business in the last three and a half years, and thanked the exhibitors for the assistance they had given in bringing the shows to a high standard. "It is through your efforts that the business is what it is to-day," he said.

At the close of the session Wednesday afternoon, the large body of exhibitors massed on the sidewalk where there was in waiting a formidable fleet of sea-going automobiles, each built to carry forty survivors. The objective point was Coney's Isle. Each chauffeur seemed to be endowed with discretionary powers as to the shortest route to the Island, but all hands arrived at Henderson's Restaurant with only one casualty reported. An elaborate shore dinner was served on demand. It was a large and merry affair—probably the largest body of moving picture people that ever celebrated themselves at Coney Island. The watchword of the occasion was "Harmony." Harmony with a little "rag" occasionally to spice it up.

The dinner was presided over by Arthur D. Jacobs. The first speaker introduced was President Trigger. His popularity showed an increase since the morning session. Following Mr. Trigger, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Thomas Bedding, of the Universal Film Company's editorial staff. The third speaker was Mrs. Harry C. Arthur, who proved to be a capital entertainer and made the hit of the evening.

Mr. Gus Rogers, of the New York Bureau of Licenses was next introduced. His knowledge of the foibles and idiosyncrasies of motion picture people was surprising and funny.

There were many other speakers rehearsing in their coat-sleeves, but somebody issued a peremptory order for all hands to sit in judgment on the vaudeville show in the next corral. Of all the corking vaudeville bills, that was the limit. Every one of the exhibitors stayed there until the movies came on and then there was a rush for the door.

Sam Trigger was the "bell-cow." He led the party to a freak show. Florence Turner, of the Vitagraph, joined the party just before that. There's only one Florence Turner. She's the real moving picture girl wherever she is; everybody's friend.

The procession then went over to a cabaret show to do a little censoring on that "Turkey Trot" stuff. While there Mr. Neff made an address. Whether he be speaking before a serious convention, or whether he be orating in the dim shaded light of an up-stairs cabaret, he is always M. A. Neff; the most popular moving picture exhibitor in America.

Every time the party turned a corner it lost a few stragglers. By 2 a. m. it had thinned down to one load. Auto load. And "some" load.

The committee of the city association which arranged for the convention and had charge of the details of the entertainment of tthe visitors were Treasurer Arthur D. Jacobs, chairman; Harold W. Rosenthal, secretary; G. W. Anson, treasurer; President Samuel H. Trigger; Secretary Sydney Asher; Adolph Bauerenfreund; Lewis Rosenthal and William A. Landau. Their efforts will not soon be forgotten.

Good Representation of Manufacturers.

There was a generous sprinkling of representatives of machine, film and supply men at the convention. Among them were Mr. Coles and Mr. Atwater, of the Nicholas Power Co.; A. K. Greenland, of the Gaumont Co., who took a motion picture of the automobile parade; D. W. McKinney, of the Film Supply Co.; C. Lang Cobb, of the Reliance Co.; Mr. Eric Morrison, of the Standard Machine Co.; Thomas Bedding, of the Universal Film Co.; F. J. Rembush and Frank Manning, of the Mirror Screen Co.; H. J. NEW JERSEY ORGANIZED BY MR. NEFF.

President Neff, of the National League of M. P. Exhibitors, took a flying trip across the Hudson on Thursday, June 20, and effected the state organization of New Jersey exhibitors at Heflich's Hall, West Hoboken. Mr. Neff was assisted in the work by Samuel H. Trigger, president of the New York State League. After addresses by these two gentlemen the work of organizing was quickly done. The following officers were elected:

President, G. A. Robinson, Colonial Theater, 734 Demott Street, West Hoboken; first vice-president, W. A. Daly, Daly's and Grand Theaters, Paterson; second vice-president, Frank P. Daley, Hippodrome, Hoboken; secretary, P. M. Kirchner, Bijou Theater, Union Hill, N. J.; treasurer, C. Fred Ruhlman, 500 Liberty Street, Trenton, N. J.

National Vice President, L. F. Blumenthal, Jersey City.

Delegates to the Chicago National Convention will be: C. Fred Ruhlman, Trenton; Mr. Geo. M. Hemmel, Orange; Jas. Epstein, Union Hill. Alternates: D. L. Fisher, Newton, N. J.; P. A. Adams, Paterson; W. Clarke, Jersey City.

After the meeting there was a luncheon, during which there were further addresses by Mr. Neff, Mr. Trigger and Mr. F. C. Rembusch, secretary of the Indiana State Exhibitors' League.

HO! FOR THE TOLEDO CONVENTION.

The Ohio State Convention to be held at Toledo, Ohio, July 16th and 17th, will come at just the time to especially please the Southern exhibitors, as the bathing and boating season will be on and the refreshing breeze from Lake Erie and the moonlight excursions will bring joy to the hearts of hundreds of the exhibitors from the inland cities and towns. A visit to the old fort and view of the surroundings where only a few years ago the noble redman of the forest chanted his weird war dance and nailed the scalps of the pale faced pioneers to the historical log fort at the junctions of the rivers will be interesting. This is where the important moving picture of the convention will be taken.

In visiting Toledo every one will have an opportunity of seeing the residence of that patriotic, conscientious Toledian, Sam Jones, who placed the banner in the mayor's office, "We practice the Golden Rule: Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you." If courteous treatment and a specially good time will attract, Toledo surely is offering a bountiful supply of entertainments, amusements and pleasure for visiting exhibitors. Big arrangements are being made to entertain hundreds of exhibitors in royal style and it is the proud boast of Toledo that once they secure a convention that the visitors are always glad to return to Toledo.

The efficient manner of Local No. 3 in handling and managing balls, banquets and other entertainments which they give will be seen and enjoyed on the 16th and 17th of July. We hope that every member of the league who can possibly attend the Toledo convention will be there, as a large amount of very important business will come before the convention to be discussed and decided. Manufacturers of every kind and description of articles pertaining to the motion picture business are cordially invited to attend this convention and make their displays. All film men will be welcome. Toledo has made arrangements to take care of a large crowd and we take it for granted, from previous conventions which they have handled, that they know just what they are doing.

M. A. NEFF, president.

OKLAHOMA EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

This is open season for Exhibitors' League conventions and there is great activity among the managers of the "movies." At Oklahoma City on Monday, June 13th, the picture theater managers of Oklahoma succeeded in forming a state branch of the league for that state. The convention was held at the Lee-Huckins and what was lacking in numbers was made up by the enthusiasm of those present. Visitors were entertained by the Oklahoma City managers and when not engaged in the business of the convention, some interesting diversions were enjoyed.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Clark Nichols, Dixon Theater, Holdenville, president; Clyde W. Slater, Lyric Theater, Kingfisher, secretary. In compliance with the terms of the constitution the state was divided into nine districts and a vice-president was elected to represent each district as follows: John Ransom, Hovert; Roy Web, Enid; E. E. Bland, Alva; Carl Gregg, Tulsa; L. Bickle, Ardmour; O. A. Simmons, Hugo; Dr. E. J. Mills, Poteau; DeWight Bell, Hart's Horne; Charles H. Camp, Oklahoma City.

Many plans for the betterment of picture theaters was discussed. It was estimated that there are about 250 moving picture theaters in the state and the members of the new association hope to have the greater part of them enrolled before the next meeting occurs. The time and place for the next annual meeting was not selected at this convention, but it will be announced later.

OTHER CONVENTIONS SCHEDULED.

PENNSYLVANIA—Meeting of the state league at Pittsburgh, June 24th, 25th. Convention headquarters will be at the Monongahela House.

KENTUCKY—Convention of the Kentucky state league will be held on July 2nd. Meetings will be held at the Lexington Hotel.

WISCONSIN—State league conventions will be held at Milwaukee, July 19th, 20th.

MICHIGAN—Convention of the state league at Muskogee on July 9th, 10th, 11th.

INDIANA—Meeting of the state league at Indianapolis on July 22nd, 23rd.

OHIO—The Seventh State Convention of Ohio exhibitors will be held at Toledo, July 16th, 17th. Headquarters will be at the Zenovia Hall.

The Moving Picture Educator

EDUCATING THE CULTURED.

SOME months ago it was shown in these pages how Montclair, N. J., claimed to be the most cultured city in the United States, if not in the world. Their civic, intellectual, and social pride was so great, that the moving picture was refused as if possessed of degrading tendencies. It should be noticed that the religious pride was not so strained and egotistical. True religion is humble and tolerant and so religion in Montclair took pity on the pictures and placed them amid religious surroundings, taking up the otherwise despised and outcast films and bidding the people look upon them with unprejudiced eyes free from cultured bigotry, and suspend judgment until maturity of knowledge and experience brought its own verdict.

Time has now become ripe for this to take place, and the culture of Montclair has pleaded guilty to ignorance. Howsoever paradoxical this may seem, it is true. Again the pictures have accomplished the twofold work of vindicating themselves, and educating those needing the value of a cinematographic education.

Montclair has now opened her portals to the picture. As a great pendulum swings to great extremes so the city of culture has passed from no pictures to a $50,000 picture place. The greatest sinner when converted becomes the most arrogant saint, so Montclair bids well to even overdo herself in good things by the violence of the change.

Let it be known that the pictures in the churches have won this victory. If the pictures are an evil, then the churches have wrought that evil, but Montclair is too cultured to be deceived; they were narrow in their pride, but not wicked, therefore wickedness could not thrive where religion and culture prevailed. As these two forces have now come together on one common ground, being united in marriage with the pictures playing the part of a Cupid; let it be known everywhere that, put to the greatest test in the most trying center of life, and under the most exacting circumstances, the pictures have again proved their value as a convincing factor in religion and education also as a thorough social influence for good.

Congratulations to proud Montclair for so nobly confessing her faults, and for more nobly righting them by opening her doors wide to the moving picture.

THE EDUCATIONAL SIDE OF THE PHOTOPLAY.

By Hugh King Harris.

That there is vast room for improvement in theme and story of the photoplay of to-day is true. This is naturally so, for the photoplay is but in its infancy, the photoplaywright is new at the game, and scripts as written are entirely too abridged in form to give the best stage direction possible.

However, the motion picture theater is coming into its own with rapid strides. Fortunately producers are awakening to the need of higher class films, not only along dramatic lines, but especially in those films which portray historic and educational effects, instead of the many senseless slapstick comedies and the eternal, seemingly endless chain of "Westerns," with the inevitable sheriff and the chase done over and over.

Motion pictures which serve to shed light on historical topics are assured of a ready reception by the public. While a large percentage of patrons of the picture show demand thrillers, broad comedy and melodrama, there is also a large number who would respond to the program of scenic views, travel and historical subjects.

The writer recently overheard a conversation on a street car which was interesting, along the line under consideration. Two women, well dressed, refined and educated, and apparently of high social standing were the talkers. As the car passed a certain vaudette, where big posters told of a thrilling Western drama with guns lavishly displayed, one woman laughed and remarked: "Isn't it funny how long the moving picture houses have continued in business. I should think they would run out after a while. They have such senseless shows." (And one of "yours truly" but recently shown in the theater in question.)

Perhaps she had witnessed one photoplay in all her pampered life, I don't know; but I surely would have liked to know her opinion of such films as "The Cry of the Children," "Coming of Columbus," "Oliver Twist," "Pippa Passes," "Martin Chuzzlewit," "Rainey's African Hunt," Kalem's Egyptian Films, and the many fine foreign travel scenes now showing. Perhaps she would change her mind as to the "senseless" criticism.

But the exhibitor who daily displays nothing but the sensational advertising, who does not feature the educational and higher class films, will, of course, give the passer-by the impression that photoplays are all of the class advertised.

As an educator there is nothing so valuable as the motion picture. We are none of us too old to learn, and the picture makes the lesson so much easier for all of us. Take Selig's masterpiece, "The Coming of Columbus," for example; what child viewing these pictures will not remember them? When American history is studied the views witnessed of the actual life and the discovery will come fresh and vivid to mind, serving as a stimulus and aid of the utmost value to the young mind.

The low price of admission to the motion picture theater draws a large number of persons who cannot afford to travel. but if the opportunity were granted would be glad to do so. When these people are seated before the screen why not give them the benefit and inspiration of beautiful, natural scenery, the picturesque, unique and unfamiliar, views of the cities of the United States read about, pictures of domestic life, religious rites, everyday scenes in foreign lands?

A steady diet of pure education is, of course, undesirable; the clean comedy, the tragedy, and drama all have their place, but every producer and exhibitor should at least feature the scenic, the historical, and the educational as well as the "thrillers."

Many a student, reader and thinker will be glad to respond to the program which educates, teaches and instructs, particularly in such a pleasant and economical manner as is possible through the photoplay.

ANOTHER PROPOSED ORDINANCE FOR NEW YORK.

To add to the gayety of nations and without waiting for action on the Folk ordinance, Alderman Morrison, of Brooklyn, has introduced in the Board of Aldermen of New York another proposed law, for the control of motion pictures in Greater New York. The Proposed Morrison ordinance is very lengthy and goes strong on the censorship and Sunday exhibition features. This proposed measure wants the teachers of the public schools to be the censors and without their sanction no film can be exhibited. There is a saving clause referring any contested film for a hearing before the mayor.

Ordinary films of a non-educational character, it is proposed, cannot be shown on Sundays, but educational films, approved by the proposed censors, can be shown after they are sanctioned. These latter films will be tagged "approved for Sundays" and with these tags on them they can be shown. All other films are to be tabooed for Sunday exhibition. Canon Chase, of Brooklyn, an Episcopal clergyman active in civic affairs, seems to be behind the Morrison ordinance, judging by his many commendations as to its superior value over the Folk ordinance.

STAR TO BE REMODELED.

The Star Theater, of Bradford, Pa., is to be entirely renovated, giving the place more room and a larger seating capacity. The front of the Star will have a vestibule with double doors and a ticket office on one side. The seating arrangement has been so planned that the picture can be viewed with advantage from any section of the house. The interior will be handsomely re-decorated and the place will be well ventilated. It is reported that Mr. Breakey, the manager of the Star, does not intend to raise the admission price. The house will be closed during the alteration.

Edison—McClure

Novel Plan Devised by Publishers of the Ladies' World and Edison Picture Makers.

A NOVEL plan has been devised by the McClure Publications, Inc., working in conjunction with the Edison Company, which promises to create untold interest in the pictures. "The Ladies' World," a monthly periodical published by the McClure Company, is about to print a series of stories entitled, "The Adventures of Mary." Mary is an entirely imaginary person, and is introduced to the readers of "The Ladies' World" at a tender age. What Mary does and what happens to her as she grows to womanhood will be told in stories appearing in that publication. To create a wider interest in the adventures of Mary, the publishers will ask their readers to contribute ideas, regarding Mary and the things they think she ought to do, which contributions may have a greater or less influence upon Mary's published career.

In considering some of the possibilities of this series, Mr. Edward A. MacManus, of the McClure Company, devised a plan whereby the moving picture could be worked in conjunction with the story. It was his idea that the subject of the adventures of Mary could be turned as interestingly into picture stories as it was suited to the magazine story. Accordingly he approached the Edison Company with the proposition and was enthusiastically received. The result is that with each printed story of the Mary series there will appear a "Mary picture." As the McClure Magazine has a circulation of three-quarters of a million, it can be readily seen that unusual attention will be directed to the picture version of the adventures of Mary. On the other hand, with the great circulation of the pictures, a matter difficult to estimate, though known to run into the millions, wide interest is certain to be aroused in the magazine story. As a co-operative plan of publicity it is difficult to imagine anything that would be more highly productive of the desired results than this alliance between a magazine and a picture maker. The high character of "The Ladies' World" will insure the introduction of the picture to some of the very best people in this country. Mr. MacManus is very enthusiastic over the prospects. In response to a query from the Moving Picture World as to why he selected the Edison Company, Mr. MacManus made the following reply:

> I am very glad that you asked our reasons for associating the Edison Company with our series, "The Adventures of Mary." As a writer and publisher you are well aware of the editorial tone which a publication sets as its fixed policy. It matters not whether it be a technical trade journal, newspaper or a high grade magazine, its style and tone is fixed beyond any doubt.
> With this as a first consideration we naturally turned to the Edison Company, as we believed they endeavored to produce photoplays written by authors of the first rank in the literary field.
> When I learned that Mr. Banister Merwin and other writers of his calibre were doing practically all the manuscripts for the Edison Company and that company was adding to their efforts by using the best people in the dramatic field, naturally we turned to them with the "Mary" idea.
> Personally, I am fond of photoplays and I had noticed during the past few years that the Edison Company had a distinct undertone of quality in their productions and I felt quite satisfied with the developments of the scenarios.
> I believe that a high literary quality and interpretations by people of dramatic ability tend toward the future success of the photoplay.

This is a flattering tribute and a deserved one, and the distinction which will accrue to the Edison Company through its alliance with "The Ladies' World" is a suitable reward for its enterprise in securing the co-operation of the better class of writers. It will be interesting to observe the developments of this unique plan.

The production department of the Edison Company has become quite enthusiastic over the plan and is making a strong effort to produce a series of pictures that will be of absorbing interest. Mary Fuller has been cast for the name part of the series, when Mary becomes sufficiently grown up to play in the "movies," and the other parts as the story develops will be played by the best talent the Edison Company can command, the purpose being, according to Mr. Plympton, manager of the department, to create pictures that will arouse an interest in the subject.

"The Workman's Lesson"

The Value of Safety Devices Illustrated in an Edison Picture Produced in Co-operation with the National Association of Manufacturers.

FOLLOWING upon its excellent series of sociological subjects which teach important lessons of life and right living, the Edison Company offers an excellent picture produced in co-operation with the National Association of Manufacturers, illustrating the value of safety devices in manufacturing plants where machinery is in operation. It is a well-known fact that almost as much opposition to the installation of safety appliances comes from the workmen whom the device is sought to protect, as from the owner of the plant whose parsimony frequently causes him to neglect the welfare of his employees. This idea is brought out in a forceful manner in the Edison subject entitled, "The Workman's Lesson." The old workmen in the plant are very much opposed to the safety devices and discard them at every opportunity, despite the insistence of the foreman and proprietor. One old fellow is particularly disregardful and, on numerous occasions, is reprimanded for his neglect to keep the protecting shield over the chock of his lathe.

Scene from "The Workman's Lesson" (Edison).

In the course of events a young foreigner drops into the old workman's home, and is taken in by the charitable old fellow, who recognizes in him a skilled mechanic. He secures a position for the young man in the factory where he himself is employed. The safety devices are explained to the young man, but the old fellow tells him they are a nuisance. Taking his friend's advice, the young mechanic disregards the safety appliances, and his arm is caught in the lathe.

Now it has happened that the young mechanic is in love with the old workman's daughter and they are to be married, so when the old fellow discovers the serious result of his mistaken advice, he is grief-stricken, especially when he is led to believe by the hospital physicians that the young man has lost his arm. It is a lesson for the old man who has disregarded the safety devices that is not lost, even when he finally discovers that the arm has been saved and everything in the little cottage is sunshine.

FRA DIAVOLO ADVERTISING MATTER.

The Solax Company announces that its three-reel feature production, "Fra Diavolo," which is being handled on a state rights plan, will have the full complement of special advertising matter. Elaborate heralds, programs, lobby displays and several styles of one-sheet and three-sheet posters with cuts and still pictures have been prepared and are now ready for shipment. A special music accompaniment for both piano and violin has been arranged. Interested exhibitors will be advised of state right buyers in their territory. It is also announced that in a number of states exchanges buying the product of the Film Supply Company will handle "Fra Diavolo" in their territory.

SELIG WAR PICTURE ON CURIOUS INCIDENT.

The second of a series of war dramas will be released by the Selig Company on July 5th under the title of "Baby Betty," a story of the Civil War. This picture is founded on one of the most curious incidents in the history of the Civil War. It tells how a baby girl innocently delayed or rather averted an impending battle by carrying a flag of truce into the midst of the scene of action.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

CREDIT is due the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America in the various states where organizations have been formed for regulating a great evil, viz.: the has done so much to degrade the moving picture, viz.: the presentation of four and five reels for five cents. Cases without number could be cited where misguided competition between exhibitors has led to the bankruptcy of many because of this policy. Shortsighted exchanges, in many cases, have assisted in the undoing of their renters by supporting the policy, overlooking the fact that a public demand is being created that will finally swamp the exchange itself as well as the exhibitor.

In Indiana and Ohio the state organizations of the league have wisely made it binding on the members that not more than three reels shall be offered on any program for five cents admission. In Chicago, it is the consensus of opinion among members of the league that not more than three reels shall be offered; and, it is understood, exchanges have been approached on the subject by members of the league requesting that not more than three shall be rented to any exhibitor whose admission is five cents.

Notwithstanding the fact that the policy proved a wise one both for the exhibitor and the exchange, it has developed within the last few weeks that there are violations of the understanding, and that certain exhibitors are using four, and even five reels, on their programs for an admission of five cents. But this retrogression is not all of the evil existing at present in Chicago, in the matter of film renting. Some exhibitors are demanding six reels on Sundays—three for the afternoon and three for the evening—so that two different programs are offered on that day.

Where will this policy lead? The direction is clearly outlined by past experience; to the loss, eventually, of the exhibitor and to the detriment of motion picture entertainment.

Let no exhibitor think that his competitor will permit him an advantage of this kind. It usually results in a fight to the financial death of one or the other, or of all, of the competitors in the case. The picture theaters in a neighborhood have just so many patrons to depend on. Is it not clear, other things being equal, that every exhibitor engaged in such unwise competition is spending more for his service, without any increase in his receipts, and that each is actually giving away good coin of the realm like a foolish boy who doesn't know the value of money.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America has shown that it stands for the right in such cases. With increased membership and a binding obligation on its members, it can secure the co-operation of exchanges and banish these evils from picture theaters.

"The Fall of Black Hawk."

I had the privilege of seeing the American's fine two-reel subject, "The Fall of Black Hawk," at a private exhibition a few days ago. The films had not then been provided with sub-titles, but the sections had been assembled so that it was easy to judge of the dramatic, educational and technical values.

There will be surprises for many close students of pioneer history in these films; and it can be said in all truth that there will be many delightful surprises for moving picture lovers. The action of the story is, of necessity, laid out in the wide open of the woods and plains, and these films abound in magnificent vistas of river, wood and lake. It is difficult to recall any film of a dramatic nature that has offered such a wealth and beauty of natural scenery as can be viewed in "The Fall of Black Hawk." And these fine views have been rendered still more realistic by artistic toning and tinting. There are scenes of sunrise and sunset that fairly merit to be pronounced admirable. In connection with these beautiful settings one has picturesque and stirring views of Indians in their war costumes, stalking their enemies, the pioneers, by stealth and lying in wait for them in deadly ambuscade.

In the next issue a careful review of these films will be given. Mr. Hutchinson, president of the American, has informed me that the cost of production of this subject has greatly exceeded the original appropriation. The great number of people employed and the necessity for securing the right light conditions for the camera men meant large expenditures for the extra time consumed alone.

"The Fall of Black Hawk" will be handled on the state rights plan, so Mr. Hutchinson informs me. Release will be made on July 10th.

Attractive Features for Michigan Convention.

Mr. and Mrs. Carl Ray, of Muskegon, Mich., passed through the city last Tuesday, June 18th, on the way from Latonia, Ky., where they saw the Derby race ran off. Mr. Ray informed me that Carl Laemmle had exclusive rights for filming this race and that the pictures will be used in a big Imp subject soon to be produced.

Mr. Ray, who is the owner of an extensive circuit of moving picture theaters in Muskegon and adjoining cities, is treasurer of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Michigan. He stated that the State Convention, to be held in Muskegon on July 8, 9, 10 and 11, will have a large attendance, judging from present indications. Visiting members of the league will not be confined to residents of Michigan, as many in neighboring states have signified their intentions to attend.

The following order of business for the days of the convention were outlined by Mr. Ray: On July 8 the state officers will hold a meeting. July 9 will be devoted to the reception of guests, addresses by the Mayor and other speakers of prominence. In the evening a business meeting, in which all the delegates in attendance will participate, will be held. In the afternoon, July 10, there will be another business meeting of delegates, while lady visitors will be entertained by sight seeing in autos. In the evening the visitors will be treated to a "fish fry," for which Muskegon is noted. The "fry" will be held at a picturesque point on the shore of the lake, where the fish will be secured from the water easily by hand, and in a few minutes will be transformed into toothsome morsels. The morning and afternoon of July 11 will be spent in business meetings by the delegates. At 6:30 p. m. the visitors will be conveyed to the pier at Lake Mona, where the steamer, City of Mona, with Beerman's band aboard, will be in readiness to take the party to Lake Harbor Hotel. This trip will afford a delightful outing, lasting about an hour, after which the whetted appetites of the visitors will be appeased by a banquet in the hotel.

M. A. Neff, national president of the league, has promised to attend.

Chicago Film Brevities.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, will leave about July 9th for an extensive business trip through Europe. Considerable time will be spent in London, where the branch of the company will be enlarged in a ratio commensurate with the growth and importance of the American's product. Mr. Hutchinson will be accompanied by his son, who is a student at a leading military college in the Middle West.

Charles R. Svinning, proprietor of the Montrose Family Theater, Robey Street and Montrose Avenue, has sold that house to William Kruse, of this city. The Montrose seats 300 people. It has an excellent ventilating system, and the new manager will keep the house open all summer. The Laemmle exchange furnishes the service. Messrs. Svinning & Kruse were visitors at the World office last week and Mr. Kruse became a subscriber to the publication.

Carl Laemmle, president of the Imp Company, arrived in the city Monday, June 17th. He departed with his family on Tuesday, for Elkhart, Wis., where a week or more will be spent in outing.

Mr. Holiday, Gaumont's expert camera man, was a guest at the LaSalle Hotel all last week. He is taking pictures for Gaumont's Weekly of noteworthy incidents during the National Republican Convention.

D. H. McCarty and Ralph E. Peckham, of Grand Rapids, Mich., have leased the Temple Theater, at Muskegon, Mich., and will run the house as a picture theater throughout the summer. Mr. McCarty writes that only feature films will be used. He states that this is the first time the Temple has ever been run as a first class photoplay theater. The Temple seats 800 people. Five hundred seats will be held at five cents and the remainder at ten cents. The theater will be run daily from noon until 11 p. m. High class music and two spotlight singers will appear during the presentation of each program. Mr. McCarty will manage the house.

"The Adopted Child."

A Dramatic Feature Production by Pathe Freres Soon to be Released.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

HERE is an original story of the French type with an abundance of dramatic situation and good acting. There are some lively scenes in the piece, but the motive is both clean and strongly enforced. The cast is as follows:

Dartes, husband of Theresa	M. Kemm
Verdier, loving Marion	M. Cappellain
Smiley, ragpicker protecting Marion	M. Milo
Mother Gruff, ragpicker protecting Marion,	Mme. Lange
Theresa, wife of Dartes, loving Verdier,	Mme. Massart
Marion, lost daughter of Dartes, cared for from infancy by the ragpickers	Mme. Pascal

The prologue starts with the death of little Marion's mother in a state of destitution because of the long absence of her husband in America, where he is seeking his fortune. She dies in the hovel of Smiley and Mother Gruff, both ragpickers, and these humble people pledge themselves to care for Marion until the child's father shall be found. They have no clues as to his whereabouts and only two to his identity, his photograph and a letter in which he writes that he is struggling hard to make good that they may enjoy a full measure of happiness on his return. Smiley and Mother Gruff undertake the maintenance and education of motherless Marion, and the child becomes a favorite among the band of ragpickers to which they belong.

After this introduction, the main action starts ten years later. Dartes has returned from America a wealthy man and is married a second time to a very seductive creature of voluptuous figure and ardent temperament. She has obtained all that she might expect from a man prematurely aged by severe exertion, all that wealth could purchase, but an inadequate response of love from her husband. He is affectionate and considerate, but they are childless, and Theresa is beginning to weary of what money will buy. Having overvalued the purely material advantages of abundant possessions and stimulated by natural longings, she is on edge for some romantic adventure. She is absolutely toppling when the right man comes along—he proves to be Verdier—but she is a little bit late, as his affections have become engaged by the daughter of the man she has married.

Verdier is a young physician of attractive appearance, who catches a glimpse of Marion while rendering charitable services to members of the band of ragpickers. Marion is no longer an active member of the band—she has become a coy young milliner—but she visits her protectors, Smiley and Mother Gruff, and is thus brought to the attention of the handsome practitioner. It is a case of love at first sight with the young doctor, and he soon has need of this preemption of his affections as a defense against the onslaught of ardent Theresa. The lady's carriage knocks Marion down as the latter is leaving the band of ragpickers to return to her shop and she is carried back to where Doctor Verdier can give her first aid. Theresa follows—she is more decent than those who ride in autos—and not only meets Marion but her ideal in Verdier.

The situation grows more and more complicated when Verdier finds himself a guest at the house of Dartes, whose lost daughter he loves and whose wife loves him. Dartes knows nothing of Marion's existence, though he has sought her through the usual agencies, and he has no suspicion of his wife's sudden infatuation. Verdier is an honest and honored guest in his home, mingling freely with other callers and innocent of design on the happiness of his host. Theresa is the villain, and she is very, very wicked. She tries her best by simple arts to engage the interest of the handsome young practitioner, but he is merely polite enough to drive her to extremities.

Theresa leaves the salon where her guests are being entertained, goes to an adjoining withdrawing room and deliberately faints. Her preliminary screech before collapsing brings her husband into the chamber and he calls in medical aid in the person of Verdier. When he leaves the physician to his practices and the wife to hers, when these two are left together, unchained by social restraint, Theresa becomes so warm in her protestations of love that theater managers will have to start the fans if they do not ring down the asbestos curtain to keep the house from catching fire.

Dramatic Scene from "The Adopted Child," by Pathe Freres.

Scenes from Pathe's Feature Production "The Adopted Child."

Verdier is compelled to act with caution as well as dignity—Lord Byron knew what he was talking about when he said that Hell has no fury like a woman scorned—and discovery of Theresa's budding infidelity is barely averted when her husband suddenly returns. It is the narrowest kind of an escape, for Dartes is a fighting male and not wise enough to know that men of the world only follow where women indicate the path. He has the strength and temper of high-strung Frenchmen, who demand explanations at the point of a rapier or muzzle of a pistol.

Theresa recovers completely from her fainting fit, thanks to the power of Verdier unconsciously exerts over her, and the fact that she had employed temporary illness as a ruse to be near the man she loves, but there is no cure for her folly short of compromising both husband and doctor. She writes a note to Verdier, stating that loves him and detests her husband, re-enters the salon and recklessly passes the incriminating letter to the young practitioner, when she finds him standing alone near a window. She is accidentally seen by Dartes; he dashes madly at her and thrusts her back, while demanding that Verdier shall show the communication. The young doctor throws it out of the window, and a struggle between the two men is prevented with difficulty by all the males in the assembly. A challenge and demand of immediate satisfaction follows, and the men adjourn for some swordplay in dead earnest.

Outside of the house in which this occurs ragged Smiley is meandering along cheerfully, picking up whatever comes his way, when the compromising note comes fluttering down from the window above. He seizes it, reads it, and has barely time to hide it when a large party of gentlemen in evening attire emerge from the house and decide to settle matters on the spot in the light of the street lamps. Smiley hides, then steals forth and recognizes one of the contestants as the kind physician who has treated so many of his band for their ailments. He also takes note of Verdier's assailant during the fight.

When Verdier falls pierced by the angry husband's sword, Smiley rushes in and carries the wounded man away, taking him to Marion's home. Verdier bears up bravely for a while, but finally reveals that he is desperately injured, and is put to bed under the joint care of a fellow-physician and gentle Marion. The situation now conduces to arousing a reciprocal feeling in her breast—pity is akin to love—and the motherless young girl who cannot find her father, thrills with "the joy that is counterpart of fear"; the sudden silence and reserve when near, as the alarmed heart leaps in the breast, and knows, and names, and greets its god-like guest. She, too, falls in love.

Smiley, the good angel of the piece, concludes to glance over the clues left by Marion's mother as soon as Verdier and Marion are engaged, and he makes the startling discovery that the man who wounded Marion's lover was none other than her father. He does not reveal this newly-acquired knowledge to the young couple, but goes straight to the house where he found the note and witnessed the duel, forces his way past the servants into the presence of Dartes, and exhibits evidence that he has found the latter's long lost child. He tells the story of how he raised her from the time she was a little girl, and is implored by the father to bring Marion to his house.

During the good angel's absence, the bad one pays a visit to the milliner's shop and surprises Verlain in a tender relation with Marion. Theresa disappears, and the newly-engaged ones celebrate their plighting of troth among Marion's old friends and associates, the ragpickers. Returning Smiley plunges into the midst of the festivities with the announcement that he has found Marion's father and drags the young girl away, leaving her lover in a very uncertain state of mind. Marion is taken to her father's house, is identified by him and introduced with fond pride to the jealous Theresa.

The infuriated wife attacks the young girl as soon as they are left alone together; Smiley breaks into the room and interferes; servants are called and lock Smiley up in the cellar, and Theresa starts in to make her daughter-in-law's position as unenviable as circumstances will permit. To American audiences the authority and power of the French father is so little understood that the obedience of French children is a matter of surprise. This is due to an old law traced from the Roman occupation, which is still in the code, and says that a child cannot leave the home without permission, until attaining majority or emancipation.

Villainous Theresa has things her own way for a while, with Smiley locked up in the cellar, but he manages to communicate with his ragpicking friends through a grating and sends a letter to Doctor Verlain, describing his situation and that of the unhappy Marion. Verlain cannot openly enter the house—it is that of the man who misconstrued his conduct with Theresa and ran him through with a rapier—but an opportunity to do so secretly is afforded by the fancy ball Dartes is to give in celebration of finding his daughter.

On the night of the ball there is a grand ensemble—everybody is there except the ragpickers, and they are not far away. In the midst of the revelry Verdier appears in disguise and manages to communicate with Marion. They have only a few words together, sweet assurances of eternal devotion, when Theresa penetrates the young physician's disguise, and he is exposed before the entire company. Things begin to look dark for Verdier, already turned out of the house under allegations of attempting to dishonor it. Suddenly Smiley appears. At last! Now, villainous Theresa, you will get what is coming to you! Still, it seems a pity. There is something so compensating about Theresa's curves. Smiley produces Theresa's note to Doctor Verdier; it opens her husband's eyes; his indignation knows no bounds; he drives his faithless wife from the room and becomes reconciled to the prospective union of his daughter Marion and Doctor Verdier during the jollification which follows.

The French productions of Pathe Freres are in the front rank so far as originality of plot is concerned. They are not dreary adaptations from what has been popular, but can seldom be revived in rivalry of what is in the public mind of to-day. Their stories are theatrical but are not flat, stale and unprofitable as are those two and three reel offerings of American producers which depend entirely upon the misuse of some honored literary name for their market value, and fail to attract more than passing interest from the public. The feature play of to-day must be of to-day, must fit in with the sentiments and aspirations of the people, and those who are strutting around in borrowed plumes would find this out if they would take the pains to get at the opinions of intelligent exhibitors and patrons.

There is a call for the French productions because French producers are traveling in the right direction, are turning out photodramas of originality, vigor and high artistic merit.

"The Last Dance"

Selig's Independence Day Release, Written by Kathlyn Williams.

MISS KATHLYN WILLIAMS, the beautiful and talented favorite of the Selig players, has again demonstrated her ability and versatility by writing what promises to be one of the season's best human interest scenarios. It is called "The Last Dance" and will be released by the Selig Polyscope Company on July 4th. The picture is one thousand feet in length and tells the story of the pathetic romance of a dancing girl.

Miss Williams, with poetic charm, has drawn her character as they would appear in real life. In the scenes showing the stage, dressing-rooms, and auditorium of a theater, as well as those taken in and about the poppy fields of a country home, a realistic atmosphere has been secured without resorting to theatrical methods. The story while dramatic and absorbing, is told in a simple, appealing, straightforward manner that relieves it of the usual sordidness which oftentimes mark productions of this nature.

Miss Winnifred Greenwood as the Dancing Girl in "The Last Dance," Selig's 4th of July Release.

Mr. Oscar Eagle, who recently joined the Selig producing staff, after many years of success upon the legitimate stage, was chosen to direct "The Last Dance" and the result obtained by him in this, his first picture, argues well for a brilliant future in his new line of endeavor.

Miss Winnifred Greenwood, one of Selig's most popular leading women, plays the principal part, that of Mignon, the dancing girl, and those who were fortunate enough to see the private exhibition of this subject in the Selig vaults a few days ago declare that Miss Greenwood's work in this part is, without doubt, the best she has yet done in the silent drama. The part gives excellent opportunity for strong emotional acting and Miss Greenwood rises to the occasion in her usual style.

The story of "The Last Dance" is told briefly as follows: James Norton, club man and first nighter (played by Charles Clary) meets and becomes infatuated with Mignon, a classic dancing girl, who is just then the sensation of the Metropolitan Variety Theater. He finds her to be vastly different from those with whom she is associated in the theatrical world and his respect for her is as great as his love. Mignon, young, pretty, and wistful eyed, loves refinement, and the good pure things of life, and hates everything licentious or vulgar. She loves her art, but hates her environment and oftentimes yearns to be away from it all. She likes Norton and appreciates his pure love and friendship, but will not marry him until she feels sure of herself.

Scene from "The Last Dance" (Selig).

Mignon is subject to fainting spells and attacks of weak heart. These grow worse until one night while she is dancing, her heart fails and she falls in a faint on the stage, causing the curtain to be rung down.

The doctor is sent for and Norton, who is in the auditorium, rushes behind to her dressing-room. The doctor insists that she stop her work immediately and go to the country to rest. Norton tells her once more of his love and she asks him to come to the country after she is rested, telling him that she will then give him his answer.

The doctor arranges for her to go to the country home of his sister. She does so and this new world that is opened up to her acts as the best of tonics for her weak heart and unstrung nerves. She grows to love the country and its simple, good-hearted, church-going people.

Scene from "The Last Dance" (Selig).

John Harlow, a young minister, of rather Puritanical ideals, meets and falls in love with Mignon, and she, realizing that here indeed is true love, the kind she has longed for all of her life, decides that she cares more for Harlow than for Norton, and so gives herself to the minister.

Harlow is ignorant of her former stage life and Mignon, fearing for her own happiness, does not tell him. They are very happy in each other's company and make their plans for the future. One day Norton arrives upon the scene, having come for Mignon's answer. She tells him that she cares for Harlow and he, in his understanding, releases her. Meantime, Harlow has accidentally run across a magazine article and picture of Mignon and learns of her connection with the stage. He frantically rushes to the field where Mignon and Norton are talking and, in a frenzy, denounces the woman for an adventuress. Norton tries to convince Harlow of the girl's purity and worth, but Harlow will not listen. Norton discreetly leaves them together awhile, and Mignon, heartbroken, pleads with the minister not to cast her aside, but to let her prove to him that her dance is not vulgar. Finally she persuades him to sit and watch while she dances for him.

In her excitement and hysteria she dances as she never had before, a fast whirling, gliding, dance of the wood nymphs. Faster and faster she whirls—here and there over the little woodland clearing—while the young minister sits and watches, awed and pleased.

Seeing that he is relenting she brings the dance to a wild, chaotic climax, and as she completes the last step and turns for his answer, her heart fails her, she stumbles, and falls limply to the ground dead.

The Saloon and The Moving Pictures

A Fair, Sane, Conservative Consideration of an Important Subject Viewed Briefly in All Its Various Aspects.

By the Rev. A. W. Wilmington.

THE saloon question has been, for a number of years, an important figure on the stage of life; and the limelight of public opinion has rightly been thrown with full strength of brilliancy upon it and reflected its hideous characteristics by its illumination.

Someone who has taken the trouble to figure it out says: "The liquor question is the only live financial problem before the people to-day. According to the American Grocer this country pays out annually for drink one and one-quarter billions of dollars and the indirect cost—poverty, crime and loss—is equal to three-quarters of a billion more. That is five times as much as America pays for bread, eleven times as much as it pays for education, thirteen times as much as it pays for religion and churches and one hundred and seven times as much as it pays for home and foreign missions. It is much bigger than the Steel Trust, eight times as big as the Tariff and compared with Free Silver, it is, as a question, 16 to 1. The saloon question is the great and only question that is likely to absorb the thought of this country for years to come."

As Wendell Phillips says: "No one supposes that law can make men temperate, but law can shut up these bars and dram shops which feed intemperance and facilitate it, which doubles our taxes, trebles the peril to property and life, and make the masses tools in the hands of designing men to undertake and cripple the law."

The question which has been hurled at temperance advocates from time immemorial: "If you take the saloon from a man, what can you give him in its place?" This question is very likely to adjust itself, if right-minded, clear-headed, sane and conservative people will allow it to do so. Water reaches its own level. A man can be led, but not driven.

The fact that the temperance cause has an invaluable adjunct in the moving picture exhibitions, and also the fact that the saloon-keeper is not a lover of the 5-cent moving picture parlors, is evidenced by the following conversation related to me by a personal friend, for which reason I will not give his name. My friend was formerly an agnostic, a gambler, and a freuenter, too often of the saloons, but now a habitue of the moving picture exhibitions and a totally reformed man, as to resorting to the saloon, gambling houses or low places of amusement. He has also a more broad-minded view and finds that home is more to him now than ever before. This is the conversation between him and a man whose saloon he had formerly frequented, and the meeting at this time was upon the street:

"Hellow, Schwartz, what are you doing in these parts?"

"I am looking for a job."

"Looking for a job! What's the matter with your saloon?"

"Oh, dere ain't no more money in der saloon bizness like dere wunst was."

"How's that?"

"Dose (strong adjective) moving picture shows take all der money away," he moaned dolefully.

"But only women and children go there, do they not?"

"Yes, but dey take dere husbands wid dem, and den dere husbands take dere wives and don't come to de saloon."

"But they come after the show, many of them, do they not?"

"No, dey go home wid dere wives and stay dere. I tell yer dere is no more money in der saloon bizness like dere wunst wuz."

From the foregoing I take a very encouraging view of the solution of the drink problem. I would like to see opposite to every saloon corner a moving picture exhibition. Let us now view the moving picture problem. To the film manufacturers I have this to say: "Gentlemen, you have before you the gate of opportunity and it is wide open. If you wish to have it remain so, remember the fact that 'There is nothing better than the best.' Maintain a high superiority of the class of your pictures. In order that you may obtain the recognition of the broadest, the most conservative and the most sane minds, it is most necessarily essential that your products be, like Cæsar's wife, beyond reproach."

As an educational feature the moving picture has no equal. Sermons are intended to plant a germ thought in the fertile soil of the mind from which fruit, when matured, will transform man into the image of the pattern which Christ intended man to be. Very often more can be taught through the eye than through the ear. Therefore, gentlemen, be careful of the seed which you are preparing to plant in the mind (through the eye) of the child, the youth, the maiden, the wife, the husband, the young or those of mature old age. "For as ye sow, so shall ye reap."

Now a word to exhibitors. Be careful in the choice of your views. Avoid anything which has the faintest sign of suggestion, touch not the lewd or the fragrantly sensual. Produce nothing upon your screen which would cause your mother to blush. Be careful of your audience and safeguard the young. Remember the strength of a nation is its trust in God and in the proper training of the young within its borders. I have thus briefly offered these hints, and if profited by I most certainly believe that the moving picture exhibition will be looked up to and appreciated more than ever it has been before. And I make this prophecy that we will find that, if properly conducted both by film manufacturer and exhibitor, in ten years' time we will be able to say: "The moving picture did more good by gentle means for the cause of temperance than all the axes that were ever wielded."

In conclusion let me make this statement. I do not wish this advocacy of the moving picture exhibition to be construed into the false idea that the moving picture show is the solution to the question: "What will you give a man if you take from him the saloon?" It is only as I said a valuable adjunct which partially solves the great problem before us. Christianity only is what we can offer to the drunkard or the gambler, but he must take it himself. We cannot force anyone into the kingdom of Heaven. Neither do I wish my statements to be construed into the idea that I uphold the violation of the First Day of the Week, known as the Lord's Day, or Sunday and often (erroneously) called the Sabbath Day. I do no such thing.

GEORGE KLEINE CINES AND ECLIPSE RELEASES.

George Kleine announces three excellent films for the week ending June 29th. A clever comedy is that for Tuesday, "The Girl and the Mayor," which will appeal to everybody. The story deals with a pretty girl who becomes a suffragette, is overzealous in upholding the "cause" and is taken before the Mayor, but strange to say she makes such a good impression upon that official that he engages her as his stenographer and soon afterward as his wife. The situations are extremely comical and the action fast and furious, which should cause a great deal of amusement. Miss Dorothy Ferreri takes the part of "the girl" and Mr. Thomas Lupi is "the mayor." Both do excellent work.

For June 26th, "The Music Hall Singer" is a drama which deserves especial praise on account of the elaborate settings and the careful attention to detail. A charming young woman wins fame and fortune as an opera star while her husband suffers in poverty, but later he proves himself a hero by rescuing her from a dangerous fire in the theater. This is one of the best Eclipse productions placed before the public in some time.

The Saturday release, "The Wandering Minstrel," is a story of human kindness and charity in the lower walks of life. Old Jacques, a veritable patriarch among street musicians, protects a poor, homeless girl from insult and then takes her to his humble attic abode, where he instructs her to play the violin and thus enter into a new and happier existence. The story is very vividly told and will hold the interest to the last.

Mr. Geo. Cox, of the Selig producing department, has taken a small company for a two weeks' cruise through the islands of northern Lake Michigan and Superior. Some interesting marine pictures are expected as a result of this trip.

Doings in Los Angeles

Western Producers Leading in Novel Maneuvers and Clever Work on Big Ensemble Scenes. General Small Talk of the Studios.

HERE is a new and valuable use for motion pictures: The senior class of the University of California, at Berkeley, which has just departed from the institution forever, has left behind it in the archives of the university a graphic record of all the interesting events connected with its last year of college life. There are three 1,000-foot reels of motion picture film on which are recorded all of the big doings in which the seniors participated during the last year.

The idea originated with Edward M. Einstein, of Fresno, Cal., member of the class, editor of the Californian, the daily newspaper published at the university by the student body, and manager of the Glee Club, which made a European tour under his direction last summer. All of which indicates that he is an active young man.

The motion pictures had fascinated him for a long time before he conceived the idea of applying them to college life. Then, on his own initiative and at his own expense, he hired a motion picture camera, employed a skilled operator to coach him and when he had taken a few lessons he began making pictures.

Among the interesting scenes he caught and preserved for posterity in this way were Tetrazzini singing for the students in the Greek theater; the Charter Day exercises in the Greek theater, with Dr. Herbert Putnam, librarian of Congress, and other notables speaking; interesting and exciting bits from several of the football and baseball games; diverse intimate scenes of college life such as students electioneering on the day of the election of officers of the student body; the Labor Day celebration, a custom unique in this institution where the students turn out for one day and perform some useful task (last year they all pitched in and constructed a road across the campus); the Parthenia, an annual festival peculiar also to the university, when the ancient Greek folk dances are revived and presented with the utmost historical accuracy; and a score of other short scenes of this kind.

Toward the end of the year the pictures were run for the benefit of the students, and one of the athletes, a hurdle racer, spent an entire afternoon waiting for the track meet scene to come around again and again, so that he could criticise his own "form."

Einstein, by the way, has another hobby, which is exploration. He is now planning a trip to South America, which he will make this summer, and now that he has become a proficient operator he will take a motion picture camera with him in the hope of bringing back records of scenes which white men have never witnessed before.

At the last meeting of the class he delivered an address on the educational possibilities of the motion picture.

Mace to Head an Imp Company.

Brief mention was made in this column last week of the fact that Fred Mace, for a long time one of the leading comedians with the Biograph Company, had not returned East when the Biograph players departed, but would remain here to appear in the Imp comedies.

It now turns out that Mace was not the only member of the Biograph Company who refused to leave California, and that his move to the Imp studio was of more significance than mere surface indications revealed. This week it was announced that the Imp people hereafter are to keep two companies at work here instead of one. Mace is to become a producer and will head a company largely made up of former members of the Biograph Company who quit that organization when it went East last week. His leading woman will be Margaret Loveridge, and others in the company will be Charles Avery, Sylvia Ashton, Frank Opperman, Seymour Hastings, Frank Short, Mary Marsh, C. L. Barr and L. McCullough, the last named having been assistant camera man for the Biograph Company, and all the others former Biograph players. Miss Marsh was one of the occasional rare finds of Director Griffith of the Biograph, but she is a Los Angeles girl and was not willing to leave her home. Her work in a forthcoming Biograph release called "The Sands o' Dee," which will soon be seen, and in which she played the principal role, is said to stamp her as one of the interesting probabilities of the future.

Mace's company will play comedies exclusively for the present and this will leave Director LeSaint and the other Imp company free to do drama only. Mace will appear in the pictures as well as direct.

Incidentally photoplay writers may be interested in Mace's announcement that his chief trouble just now is lack of photoplays. He is in the market for comedies and asks writers to submit scripts to him direct at 651 Fairview Avenue, Brooklyn Heights, Los Angeles, Cal.

How Selig Producer Filled His "Theater."

The Selig studio killed two birds with one stone and obtained a great amount of valuable free space in the local newspapers besides, when, on Sunday, June 2, they put on a big special scene at the Edendale plant.

The picture which was being produced was one called "The Masterpiece," a story of an old musician whose wonderful opera is stolen in the manuscript and produced as the work of another man.

One of the scenes calls for a crowded theater where the opera is given its premier and is hailed as a great success. It was easy enough to build the theater, but how to get a sufficient number of supernumeraries to play the audience was the problem. Lanier Bartlett, the scenario editor, was formerly a newspaper man. It occurred to him that many of his friends had hinted that they would like to be "asked out" to the studio sometime to see how the pictures are made.

Inquiry among the members of the company and the other employees at the plant elicited the fact that they all had scores of such friends. Within an hour Bartlett was able to make up a list of 500 or 600 persons, and the same afternoon the invitations went out inviting them to be present at the studio Sunday afternoon to witness the taking of a big scene. They all came and some of them brought friends.

When it was suggested that they could witness the scene best from the comfortable seats which had been provided in the temporary "theater," they were so loud in their praises of the thoughtfulness of the management that when Colin Campbell, the director, was elected later to break the news to them he had a bad case of stage fright. However, his was a false alarm, for the opportunity of appearing in a real motion picture was welcomed by the audience and there was no trouble after that. Four or five scenes were made, using the audience, and after that the visitors were told to make themselves at home about the grounds, and most of them remained to see a couple of big scenes from "Monte Cristo" photographed.

Young Deer Builds Mission.

When a motion picture director decides that he wants a thing he either gets it or something "busts."

James Young Deer, director of the Western Pathe studio at Edendale, has just finished putting on a Mexican love story. By the way, it is his century picture in California, the 100th he has produced since he became the Pathe producer.

But that has nothing to do with this story. One of the scenes in this piece is laid in California and the background is one of the famous old missions. Unfortunately, the picture could not be taken at the mission because the Selig company owns a lease giving it the exclusive right to make motion pictures of all the California missions.

Young Deer just had to have that mission in the picture and, although motion pictures are forbidden, "still" photographs were available. Young Deer bought a collection showing the Mission he had in mind and set Harry Radcliff, his scenic artist, to work in a big open space back of the studio. It took him a week to do it and it cost a sum of money that would have scared Young Deer out of trying to produce the piece if he had known beforehand what was coming, but the mission was reproduced life size and with faithful detail. He got what he wanted, but his conscience still pains him when he thinks of what it cost, and so, to put the conscience to sleep he will have to write two or three other photoplays around the same scene so as to get his money's worth out of it.

Two of the members of the Western Pathe company have just been notified that they pulled down valuable prizes in the recent costume parade held for the benefit of the Shriners during their recent pilgrimage to Los Angeles. Young Deer entered a band of nearly fifty pinto ponies with riders in Western costumes, and the Pinto Brigade was one of the hits of the day. George Champion, one of the riders, won the prize for the best cowpuncher's outfit in line, and Mrs. Charles French, who also appears regularly in the Pathe pictures, was awarded the prize for the second best women's Western costume.

"Seeing Los Angeles."

The Imp Company's split-reel release "Seeing Los Angeles," which was shown here this week, naturally excited a great deal of curiosity and proved to be an unusually potent attraction wherever it was shown. Perhaps on the principle that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country, this picture did not seem to fulfill the expectations it aroused. Los Angeles people are so enthusiastic about their city that it would probably be impossible to film it in a way that they would think did it justice. Therefore, the chief criticism—that the particular scenes selected were neither the best nor the most characteristic that could have been obtained—might have been anticipated. But one other criticism, which was passed by an exhibitor and echoed by others—that the photography in the several street scenes was unfortunately below the Imp's customary standard—was too obviously true to be debatable.

A Local Photographic "Weekly."

Los Angeles is to have a local weekly, exactly like the Pathe Weekly, the Animated Weekly and the Gaumont Weekly, except that the subjects will be strictly of local interest. All the arrangements have been perfected and the first "number" will be issued June 17. The pictures are to be made by the Sunset Motion Picture Company, 304-306 American Bank Building, this city, and the films will be shown exclusively in the "Q" theaters, four of them, operated in the downtown district by the Quinn Bros.

The Sunset Company is an independent organization which has been turning out educational, industrial and dramatic motion picture films. Frank V. Biggy is president, Robert T. Linney is secretary and treasurer, and Hugh C. McClung, who is vice-president, will be manager and producer. McClung has made arrangements with the local newspapers and press bureaus whereby he will receive immediate notice of every news story that "breaks" within a radius of 100 miles of this city. He will have two cameras with operators on duty at all times and they will cover daily assignments. Toward the end of the week all the scenes which have been taken will be assembled, the best of them will be selected to make a 1,000-foot reel and the pictures will be shown simultaneously at all the "Q" houses beginning Saturday night.

So far as is known here, Los Angeles is the first city in which the experiment of a strictly local weekly has been attempted and no doubt it will be watched with interest elsewhere. One of the features which is expected to establish the weekly in popular favor will be a scene taken each week in the crowded shopping district in which the attempt will be made to show as many faces as possible. People will always turn out to see a film in which there is a chance of seeing themselves.

An Interesting Nestor.

From the information given out at the Nestor studios concerning a drama which has just been completed there and will be released soon, it appears that the Nestor Company has some good words coming to it from those who believe that the motion pictures should be made informative and helpful to humanity in a more positive way.

The release is to be called "The Prima Donna's Story" and it was produced by Thomas Ricketts. The prologue tells the story of a famous prima donna whose assistance is sought by a young girl bent on following the same career although totally unfit for it. To dissuade her from a step that is sure to lead only to unhappiness and failure the prima donna tells her the story of her own career, the hard work, the disappointments, the vicissitudes, and the ultimate success which hardly repaid the pains it took to win.

It is an interesting story, and according to those who saw Ricketts produce it, well told by the camera. If it is not strictly educational, technically speaking, such a subject is bound to be informative and valuable to the extent that it reflects truth and shows a part of humanity what life means to another part.

Mr. Ricketts is now engaged in turning out the regular Monday releases of the Nestor Company, but he is preparing to take on the additional work of getting out a series of two-reel dramatic subjects which will be special releases.

The Rise of Quinn Brothers.

The Quinn Brothers, three of them whose initials are so much alike that the safe plan is always to avoid trying to recite them, have just taken a 50-year lease on the Tally Theater building on one of the most populous blocks of South Broadway in the shopping district of Los Angeles. Recently they acquired the Tally Theater, the only Kinemacolor house in town, and along with it the lease under which it had been operating. Having now acquired the longer term lease they will proceed to erect a ten-story hotel on the property, although the theater will remain in the street level and will be operated without interruption while the additional stories are going up. This is made possible by the fact that the walls of the theater as originally built were designed to carry the weight of the additional stories later.

The rise of the Quinn Brothers since they came to Los Angeles only a little more than a year ago has been spectacular if not sensational. In appearance they are only youths, but in wisdom and experience they are old men. Before coming to Los Angeles they operated a small motion picture theater in a small town in Arizona, but they studied the business carefully and profited by experience. When they came here and opened their first downtown house it paid from the start. They saved money and bought another house and now they have four on their string, and they are among the best paying picture theaters in the Southwest.

Their latest venture looks like a bold one, but J. C.—or is it C. J. or J. M.? no matter—says that they have figured it all out and are going into it with their eyes open.

Another Picture Company.

A new motion picture company which will confine itself exclusively to commercial work for the time being entered the local field this week. It is the Syracuse Commercial Moving Picture Company, a partnership comprising F. A. Thorne, E. A. Gardner and N. K. Parkhurst. The offices and studios are at 625½ South Olive Street.

"We have a proposition which is new and promises to be profitable, but the details will have to be withheld until we have finished making arrangements for working the local field," says Mr. Parkhurst. "After that we will explain it fully and I think it will be a suggestion out of which commercial manufacturers in other parts of the country will be able to make a great deal of money. It will only be good for a little while, however, and after we have worked it out here we expect to turn our attention to the production of straight motion pictures, dramas and comedies."

HANDSOME PICTURE HOUSE AT JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA.

Architect J. H. W. Hawkins has just completed plans for a handsome moving picture theater, named the Prince, to be built at the corner of Main and Forsyth Streets, Jacksonville, Florida. This house will be under the management of the United Amusement Company. The front of the theater will consist of illuminated columns with white Italian marble trimmings. A glass canopy will cover the sidewalk in front of the theater, which will be brilliantly illuminated by electric lights. The United Amusement Company has given a Jacksonville pipe organ firm an order for a monster orchestral pipe organ. This organ and a six-piece orchestra will furnish music. The seats and screen will be so arranged as to give perfect view of the picture from any part of the house. The place will be ventilated by four monster exhaust fans and twelve oscillating fans. There will be five exits and two standpipes with fire hose attached will be installed. A feature of the house will be a ladies' waiting and retiring room with a maid in attendance. Mr. O. P. Hall will manage the Prince Theater.

KEITH'S HARLEM OPENS TEA ROOM.

The Harlem Opera House has an innovation in its summer tea room. It has a very large foyer and a part of this has been screened off into a pleasant little parlor. Here a number of pretty tables with white wicker chairs have been placed and salads, sandwiches, coffee, tea, iced soft drinks and ice cream are served at reasonable prices. It is taking with the house's patrons and is quite popular.

Another innovation that we notice is the cigar stand. The house permits smoking in the first balcony and the stand is a great convenience, especially to those patrons who, visiting the house for the first time, did not know that they could smoke in the comfortable, well-ventilated balcony up one flight of wide marble stairs.

The attendants have new summer uniforms of Dixie green and gold lace. The doormen, Heymen and Cambell, who by turns do their act, entitled "At the Gates," cut very pleasing figures in their long frock coats.

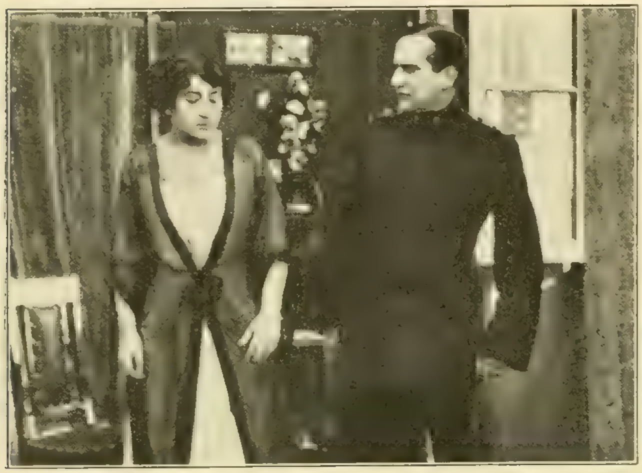
"The Inventor's Secret"

Meritorious Cines Subject to be Released by George Kleine.

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

GEORGE KLEINE has in "The Inventor's Secret" (Cines), which will be released July 30, a drama of sterling merit. The story, which is original and of absorbing interest, is clearly revealed by the pictures; and the plot leads directly to the final climax of swift retribution and awesome tragedy.

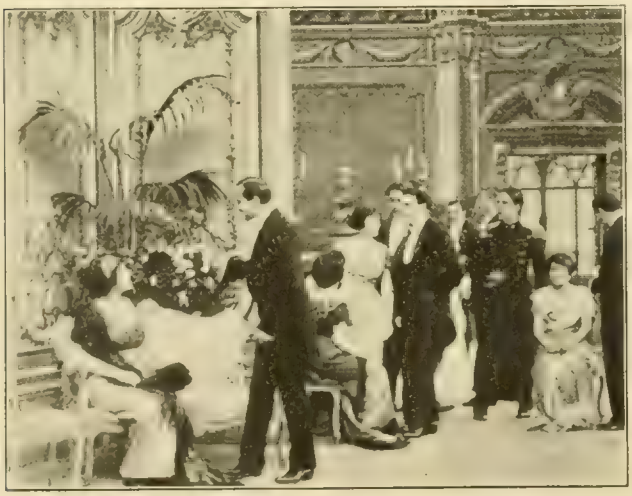
The acting of the principals in this drama is highly praiseworthy. The lady who appears as the Countess Florie, shows on her mobile and expressive face every emotion that surges through the heart and brain of that artful, unscrupulous woman. The scene at the ball, where the Countess first ensnares the unsuspecting inventor by her wiles, is enacted to the life; and so is the scene immediately following, in which her demureness passes for sweet modesty in the eyes of the lovesick man. Her duplicity, after becoming the wife of the man she seeks to ruin, is brought out so vividly that it excites enmity in the heart of the spectator. The last dread scene, where the husband is furnished indubitable proof of her connection with his enemies, will be often recalled by those who view it.



Scene from "The Inventor's Secret" (Cines).

The critical expert will be forced to concede that the photography and technique of this film are without flaw.

Marco Vanni, an officer of the Italian army, has been engaged for years in discovering a powerful, new explosive. He is first introduced to the spectator while engaged in his experiments in his laboratory, just on the eve of success. As he is about to mix a certain granulated compound with another, we see him hesitating with spatula in hand, dreading to bring them in contact lest the dream of his life may be shattered. Nerving himself for the effort, he lets the powdered substance on the spatula fall on that beneath and a smile of rapture illuminates his countenance as he looks at his attendant, overjoyed that his quest has been ended.



Scene from "The Inventor's Secret" (Cines).

But a discovery so important is bound to leak out, and the ambassador of a foreign state determines that his government must get possession of the secret formula of the new explosive. He immediately thinks of the Countess Florie, one of the most accomplished and successful agents in diplomatic circles in Europe, and requests an interview. Beautiful, clever, witty and full of expedients, without conscience, and with an inordinate love of money, this well-bred adventuress contracts to deliver the secret into the ambassador's keeping.

The engagement of the Countess, however, by the ambassador, had been a secondary move. He had first approached the inventor through his agents and offered him his own figure for the formula. This had been indignantly spurned by the Italian officer. The determination of the ambassador to secure it was intensified and, in order to accomplish his purpose, he allied himself with the beautiful and brilliant Countess Florie.

Scene from "The Inventor's Secret" (Cines).

The first move in the game of wits was the announcement of a grand ball by the ambassador. Through clever diplomacy it was arranged that the inventor, Marco Vanni, should attend the ball by an order from one of his superior officers. There, according to well laid plans, he met the alluring Countess. Singling him out as a special object of her attentions, this fascinating vampire touched his vanity and his heart. So infatuated was he by her charms, an avowal of his love and a proposal were barely averted by her masterful resourcefulness. At their next meeting the Countess, with feigned maidenly reserve and modesty, pledges to become his wife, and we see them together at his country home, shortly before the wedding.

After the honeymoon, we find the inventor and his wife in his laboratory. She witnesses the result, on a small scale, of the explosive, and employes all her wiles to learn its composition. Tenderly and laughingly he refuses to tell. Then she espies a small safe in the room, and, with seeming innocence, desires to know what it contains. This time he humors her and opens it, showing that it contains a book which gives all the details of his discovery. With the eagerness and frenzy of a panther about to spring on its prey, she seizes the book and attempts to read it. Gently he takes it from her grasp, and, replacing it in the strong box, closes and locks the safe. The fury on her face shows her disappointment.

Satisfied that mild measures are unequal to the task, and pressed by the urgent demands from the ambassador that the secret must be secured at any cost, she resolves on force.

Her husband, through her connivance, has been called away one night. Accompanied by accomplices, she enters the laboratory, and an attempt is made to force the door of the piece of furniture enclosing the safe. This, it is found, is too difficult, without using explosives, which are impossible in the case. An impression is then made of the keyhole. Just as this has been done a lookout enters hurriedly, and gives warning that the inventor is approaching the house. All retire except the Countess, who awaits the arrival of her husband with nervous anxiety. He enters with pistol in hand, having been surprised, while on the outside, by seeing a light in his carefully guarded laboratory. She has recovered control of herself by this time and lulls his fears by pointing to a book that she has been reading, seeking solace during his absence in the atmosphere where most of his time is spent.

The succeeding scene shows the successful opening of the safe and the abstraction of the book, which gives the details of the explosive, by the Countess. She has just finished a letter to the ambassador, telling him of her success, when her husband enters. She conceals the letter and the inventor immediately suspects that she loves another. She leaves the room and entering another goes to the window and drops outside the precious book and letter. An accomplice, waiting beneath, secures them and hurries away. The husband enters the room, in time to see her move back from the window, and mad with jealousy, rushes to the window and looks out. He sees no one, but his jealousy will not down even before the caresses of his wife.

The inventor is next seen examining a blotter used by his wife when writing the concealed letter. He holds it before a mirror, but the fragmentary sentence gives him no hint of the truth and rather increases his jealousy. Soon afterwards he examines the safe and finds that the book has been stolen. With horror and despair on his face, we can see that he does not yet attribute its disappearance to his wife.

The day afterwards, he discovers a letter addressed to his wife in unknown handwriting. Believing her guilty of an intrigue, he opens it. To his amazement and undoing, it reveals that his wife has stolen the papers with the secret. A demon possesses him and he plans revenge.

That night she returned to the safe for the missing page, overlooked on her former visit, and of which the letter referred to had informed both her husband and herself. The inventor had prepared a bomb of his explosive for the event. A fuse had been attached in readiness for the last act. Just as she seizes the missing page and presses it to her bosom with a smile of triumph, her husband's voice startles her. He points to the deadly apparatus and her face blanches as she tries to escape. With a grip of iron he holds her on the spot and lights the fuse. We see it splutter and smoke as it slowly approaches the cannister containing the explosive. The next instant there is darkness, seemingly dotted with red spots, before our eyes. This vanishes, and dimly we catch sight of a building rent asunder, the walls falling outward in huge sections. The new explosive has shown its power.

DENVER, COL.

Denver has thirty-two moving picture houses. Of these the Princess and Isis are giving their patrons orchestral music of a high quality. The Isis also uses a large pipe organ, and exhibit Licensed films, while the Princess gives its patrons first-run Independent pictures. Mr. Baxter, of the Isis, is rushing the building of a new and beautiful photoplay house. He is also the proprietor of a little place called the "B."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

THIS is the time of the year when the good old "20° cooler than outside" comes out on the photoshow bill boards, and perhaps some people accept the suggestion without further urging, but we are inclined to believe that a more vigorous and aggressive campaign is needed. The airdome is a good thing, but if you've just an airdome you'll find that the rainy nights cut down the patronage and perhaps you're so located that you cannot get an open-air property.

In such circumstances some managers throw up their hands and close the house. The wise man makes a fight. He has to pay rent and he figures that if he can get part business he can do a little better than the rent and pull really good money on the right sort of a rainy night, when it is too damp to go to the beach, the summer park or whatever the big attraction is, and yet not so damp but that people will come out. The very fact that you can't get an outdoor location is a pretty good sign that you've a proper sort of indoor house.

But in the first place you'll have to wake to a realization that you must pay more for five-cent pieces than in the regular season. Did you ever stop to figure out just how much your nickels cost? It's a good thing to know. Suppose that you pay out each week $200 and take in $400. Your nickels cost you two and a half cents each. If you only take in $200 they cost you five cents each or face value—and there is no profit in paying five cents for a nickel. But suppose you find that your five-cent piece is costing you three cents. Perhaps, for the summer, you'll have to pay four cents, but you still show a profit.

The extra penny goes for fans and the current to run them, for novelties and souvenirs, for extra advertising or whatever the appeal may be, but most persons would be willing to pay four cents for five, so why not you?

Summer Schemes.

Suppose that you have certain nights when postcards of the leading players are given everyone in attendance. The cards cost $4 a thousand, two-fifths of a cent each, but they bring business. Pasteboard or folding fans may be had very cheaply. In large cities there are concerns dealing largely in these cheap novelties and the cost is trifling. Use the same schme with the card fans that you do with your program. Get the drug stores and candy dealers to advertise and get your fans at cost. You can get your own imprint on as well, but you do not need the advertising so much as do the others; the soda fountains and ice cream saloons who want to see your patrons on the way out.

But fans and postcards alone are not sufficient. You want to make your patrons comfortable. Have all the windows open and keep the fans going. Strive to give an air of lightness to the place. If you have heavy velvet hangings take them down and replace them with material light both in color and weight. Get stuff that will wave in a breeze and see to it that the fans are headed so that they supply the breeze. Put your house staff in white duck and see that the suits are kept clean. If you cannot afford white uniforms, arrange with some barbers' supply company for white coats, laundered by the company and supplied daily or weekly. If you have metal designs made with the name or cipher of your house that can be fastened to the coat collars you can get almost the effect of a uniform very cheaply.

Signs and Things.

Carry your suggestion of coolness to the front of the house. Be sure there is a current of air coming through the half-opened entrance door. If you do your own sign painting have your cards carry the suggestion of snow and ice. The paint shop can probably fix you up with material. If it cannot, make your snow with white paint or plaster of paris and sprinkle with powdered glass. Put a fan in the ticket booth so that the treasurer can look cool and comfortable. No one wants to buy tickets of an agent who seems to be threatened with heat prostration. Get some catchy signs. Perhaps some of these will do:

Is it hot enough for you? It's cooler inside.

Don't look at the thermometer. Come where it's cool and look at our pictures.

Take a trip to the north pole. It's just inside the door.

Don't stand here and swelter—come inside.

Isn't it worth 5 cents to get cooled off?

Cold waves ten cents each.

One house last summer ran a fan in the lobby, a fan bedecked with flying streamers, and above it was a sign that read: "One of these to every eight people. Come in and get your share."

And get your people to back up what you've done. One summer theater discharges any employee who talks about the weather. If a regular patron comes along and remarks that it is a hot day, there is a smile and a quiet: "We forget about it in here," and gradually the public came to accept the implied suggestion that you go to Blank's to forget about the heat.

And don't make the mistake of cutting down your service bill for the summer. If anything pay a little more and get some of the features. Get the very best you can possibly afford and boom what you get.

Rainy Day Premiums.

One theater seems to have solved the rainy night problem. In the cities rain is welcomed about show time, since it "drives them in" to the theaters, but in some of the smaller towns a rain has a bad affect on the business. An observant manager has met the condition by making every rainy night a souvenir night. There are not regular souvenir nights, but every night there is a heavy rain at about theater some small souvenir is given without other than a general announcement. There is no definite promise made as to what the souvenir will be, but as the cost is generally under two-thirds of a cent, the premium on business is small and the average of business is kept up. There are many houses where this scheme would not yield a profit, but where it will work it works well.

And Talking of Features

> Owing to the increased cost of three-reel picture subjects the Cameraphone Theaters have decided that it is absolutely imperative to increase the price of admission to 10c for adults and 5c for children on the days on which they are shown. We want to give our patrons a chance to see these pictures just as soon as they are issued and in order to do so have to pay a premium.

On an inside page this additional explanation is run:

> ADMISSION PRICE
> When the General Film Company announced that they were about to release a number of three-reel subjects, the management of Cameraphone Theaters was in a quandary. We are anxious to keep in advance of everybody, and for this reason have a permanent contract with Mr. John M. Fitzgerald to prepare and deliver lectures on any pictures we think would be helped thereby. This, of course, is a considerable expense to us. Then we want to secure as many of the three-reel features as we can and get them as soon as they are issued. These pictures cost us a considerable sum in addition to our regular contract, so we have decided that we either had to raise the price of admission to 10c for adults, or wait until the pictures were older and for rent at a cheaper rate.
> We believe the Cameraphone patrons want the best and are willing to pay for it, and we know we prefer giving it to them. When Mr. Fitzgerald starts his "Martin Chuzzlewit" story we feel sure none of our regular patrons will be missing.

That Baseball Team.

Some weeks ago we suggested that a ball team might help advertise a theater. C. R. Blubaugh, manager of the Vaudette Theater, Fort Scott, Kans., has acted on the hint and has formed a team from his house staff. The boys have had five games so far and have won them all.

Mr. Blubaugh writes: "I find this a good way to get the name of your theater before the people. Your Advertising for Exhibitors is great stuff. I always read it carefully and use many of the ideas."

Baseball is the national game and even where the items about the theater are turned down, the editor will find space for a short account of the game and the box score. If you cannot get up a good team among your house staff you can put up a prize to be competed for by teams from the various factories and shops, planning a schedule that will wind up about the middle of September and holding the games on Saturday afternoons. It will not hurt your matinee business much, and will help the night show if the two teams are invited to be present. That's eighteen seats on a Saturday night, but each admission will bring others, for the friends of the players will want to be there, too, and you can get crowded houses in the slack season. If there is only one daily in town get the editor to appoint some staff man who writes of local sports to umpire and look after things generally. If there are two get some well-known local man, but play the game fairly and see to it that the teams do so as well.

Why Not?

Last week the manager of a southern theater explained how he raised his prices for "The Coming of Columbus" with a resultant profit, incidentally paving the way for other increases when the value of the subject merited a raise in the cost of admission. Why not you?

In most of the smaller towns the dramatic theater gets all grades of attractions and gauges the prices to fit the offering. The repertoire company plays a week at the popular 10-20-30, and perhaps the next week some star plays one night to $1.50 for the best seats. It is argued and accepted that the star is worth more than the repertoire players because more is given the patron. In such a case there is no complaint about the raise, and there is foundation for none. Why should you not advance your price when you offer "Martin Chuzzlewit," "The Lady of the Lake," "Jess," the Champion "Camille," or any similar special? You are giving more than your program ordinarily shows. You are offering something that makes for added cost to you. You offer something that may have cost several times what the usual three reels represent. Why shouldn't you get a better price for it?

But when you do it, do it nicely. Do not merely say that it will cost double admission to see the feature. Tell why. Explain that you are asking double because you are giving even more than double value. Tell them that the feature represents an added cost to you because it represents an added cost to the maker and that the added cost means added value. It will not take a very extended campaign of education, but it must be thorough and no obscurity of phrase should be permitted to cover up the fact that next Thursday evening the usual rates will be doubled or will be fifteen instead of ten cents. It would be well if you could set apart one night each week as feature night at an increased cost of admission. It will not be long before both Licensed and Independent exhibitors will be able to make this arrangement, and be sure of getting the films.

How About a Check Room?

The same issue of the Cameraphone Bulletin announces the establishment of a free check room for patrons. This is something that will be very greatly appreciated by shoppers, and other who carry parcels. If you ever sat in a rather narrow seat yourself, trying to hold a couple of parcels in your lap, and rising every now and then to let someone else in the row, you will appreciate what a check room means to the patrons of a photoplay theater in the busy part of the town. If you have many patrons who carry parcels we think the room will pay for itself, but get someone who will not be too busy watching the screen to attend to business, and then pay that someone sufficient wage to head off a greed for tips. The theater, cursed with a crew addicted to the tip-seeking habit, is cursed beyond reason. If it costs ten cents to get in and five cents to an usher for a seat afterward, the patron resents it, and blames the management. This, in one sense, is not reasonable, but a management that does not manage is at least partly to blame.

A Matter of Cuts.

We would suggest to the Bulletin publishers that now and then they go wrong on cuts. A Vitagraph is illustrated with cuts of Leo Delaney and Miss Grace Lewis, though the latter left the company sometime ago, and Robert Vignola and Miss Anna Nilsson grace a Kalem-in-Egypt release, though the latter is not with that section of the Kalem company. A little more care would make for improved illustrative value.

An Edison Feature.

Watch for "A Man in the Making," released by Edison, June 18th. It is as good as "Children Who Labor" for doing missionary work with, for the photoplay was produced in collaboration with the Industrial Department of International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. With this film you can reach every minister, and the Y. M. C. A. The story of the film can be found on page 1060 of the issue of this paper, dated June 15th, or in the Edison Bulletin. It is the simple story of a young man who is headed the wrong way, but who is reclaimed through the industrial department of the Y. M. C. A. activities. It is not a "goody-goody" story, nor is it a preachment. It is a simple, direct story of the average boy who wants to be good, but doesn't quite know how.

If you get advance notice of the coming of the reel get the papers interested, but first get the secretary of the local Y. M. C. A. interested in the showing. He will probably go with you to the newspaper offices and even where the papers are inclined to hammer the picture theaters, the voucher of the secretary will carry the day and be of assistance to you when you may want space for other educational specials. He will help you get in touch with the church people and the schools.

Have a special performance in the afternoon for the important guests, and send out an invitation that will look like an invitation and not like a badly printed eight-sheet. Get the secretary to address the audience on the work of the Association, get one or two others to make a few remarks on the educational value of the film, then run the story with the best possible projection, and with appropriate music. And please remember that appropriate music does not mean a succession of gospel hymns. It merely means good music instead of "Everybody's Doing It" and "I Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now."

Other Good Ones.

A short length Edison that should attract attention is "Target Practice of the Atlantic Fleet of the U. S. Navy," 650 feet of big gun practice. It was released the 19th.

"The Passer-By" is a notable photoplay; not a propaganda subject, but merely a straight story in the best Edison style, with Marc McDermott in the leading role. There is a wonderfully good reproduction of the New York Stock Exchange floor and a gripping story. "Master and Pupil," by Harry Furniss, is another of the series in which the famous English artist appears, and this reel gives more of the famous Furniss sketches than any of the subjects done during his six weeks' special engagement. Get the culture societies interested, the Art League, the Woman's Club, and all the rest. It's a good talking point and it remains with you whether it is just a reel or a maker of extra money.

A Montgomery Stunt.

> ATLANTA ART ASSOCIATION PROVES ART'S DEMOCRACY.
> The democracy of art is what the members of the Atlanta Art Association are seeking to prove in the series of lectures illustrated by moving pictures which they are putting on at the Montgomery Theater.
> The world has too long looked upon art as something to be attained in the few pictures hidden away in great art galleries in large cities or in the drawing rooms of the chosen few, and it has been one of the purposes of the Atlanta Art Association to bring art to the people and make it a part of their civic and patriotic interest.
> Free exhibitions of pictures have been given; lectures and readings, but in the proposed exhibitions Friday afternoons at the Montgomery Theater, there will be the joy not only of seeing the great masterpieces of the Metropolitan Art Gallery reproduced on the moving picture film, but the merits of these artistic masterpieces will be explained by Rev. W. W. Memminger, who is one of the foremost exponents of the finer arts in the south.
> Mr. Memminger gave the first lecture Friday afternoon.
> The undertaking of the series of lectures is under the auspices of the Atlanta Art Association, of which Mrs. Samuel Inman is president, and co-operating with the association is the committee on art from the Chamber of Commerce, the Atlanta Woman's Club and Architectural League of Atlanta. Besides the masterpiece pictures to be shown, there will be scapes of beauty photographed in and around Atlanta.

In connection with this J. T. Alsop, Jr., Secretary of the Montgomery Amusement Company, writes:

> As you fully appreciate any innovation which tends picture industry, I have to-day written our Atlanta manager, requesting him to mail you a copy of the Atlanta Constitution of May 19th, containing an article relative to the special matinee which we are giving once each week for the exhibition of art slides in our Atlanta Theater, which, as you will note from this article, is being given under the auspices of the Atlanta Art Association. This association is working in conjunction with the Woman's Club and other kindred organizations in the city of Atlanta. We are very proud, indeed, that we are able to co-operate with the good women and clergy of that city in this splendid undertaking. I wish to state that our President, Mr. Montgomery, deserves great credit for having personally interested these people in Atlanta in this art exhibition.

Passing It On.

This is a characteristic Montgomery scheme. He gets the women interested then drops back and does the solid work, letting them point with pride to what they are doing for art with the capital initial. Naturally they regard him as one of themselves, and if they go to the lectures they are apt to go to see the pictures, if, indeed, they are not already Montgomery fans, for Mr. Montgomery is too good a showman to go after the cheap money when he is able to get the better classes. More than a year ago Charles M. Seay, of the Edison Company, marveled at the elegance of the houses and the bulk of the automobile patronage, and much has been done since then. These lectures represent a definite expense to Mr. Montgomery. He loans his house, his staff, and probably defrays the cost of the slides, but in return he places the Montgomery pictures—and in a lesser degree all motion pictures—on a higher plane.

You may not be able to get up so elaborate an idea, but you can show your public spirit by donating your house to similar purposes when your regular performances are not interfered with, and greatly benefit your general attendance. Don't be just "that fellow that runs the 'Movies';" be somebody. And one of the ways is to help abolish that execreable word "movies." The spread of that word is going to cost the exhibitors thousands of dollars through lowering the tone of the business.

Another From Attica.

There is some one around the Arcade Theater, Attica, Ind., who knows how to write advertising matter. This does not appear to be taken from the Vitagraph bulletin, but it shows a familiarity with the work of Mr. Ince along his special line. It is given here that others may profit:

> RALPH INCE AS ABRAHAM LINCOLN
> IN
> "THE SEVENTH SON"
> Abraham Lincoln's wisdom, justice and mercy, never reached a grander and more eloquent climax, than in "The Seventh Son." The bigness of his heart stands out in this incident of his life as it is seldom seen elsewhere.
> The impersonation of Lincoln by Ralph Ince is a revelation. Mr. Ince has devoted all his talent, power, and stage career, to this one thing, the impersonation of Lincoln. He has not only studied Lincoln's stature, features, and facial expressions, but his very soul, his nature, and those little traits which marked this great man's life. Every move is a Lincoln move, every expression betrays a Lincoln trait. When he acts Lincoln he lives Lincoln, and through him, Lincoln lives again for us. You will feel it when you see the picture.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

MORE ABOUT MARKETS.

WITH the single exception of the Selig Company this market advice completes the list of Licensed and regularly connected Independent companies.

COMET FILM CO. (Editor not stated), 344 East 32d Street, New York City. Indicates no especial preference, but seems to be willing to look at any usual script. Independent.

That Dinner.

We have some acceptances for that dinner, but we want all the real photoplaywriters to come in.

At present the suggestion most in favor is that we go to one of those Staten Island resorts where the shore dinner is good, and there is not much of an outside crowd, but we are open to suggestions. Let's hear from you.

A Van Buren Powell, President of the Optimists, was the first to accept and is hereby allotted a seat near the far end of the table that he asks for. Two suffragette photoplaywrights want to know why they can't come in, and if there is enough of a demand from the yellow sash brigade we'll let down the bars to save the windows from being broken. We want to have the dinner some time in July. If you want to be among those present please signify your intention at once.

Foolish Advertising.

The other day we ran across a circular advertising a book on photoplay writing that offered as one of the features a guide to selling photoplays, giving all the studio addresses and wants so that one would not make the mistake of offering a cowboy drama to a studio making only polite society stuff. It was a cute little circular and probably a book that will tell all that will appeal to the person who wants to write photoplay, and who doesn't know anything about the game, but what's the use of such a list?

We supply a list of addresses to anyone who will send a stamped and self-addressed envelope. We have five hundred printed up at a time and usually these last about a month, but even in that short time there are some corrections to be rubber-stamped in.

And studio wants change even more often than do the addresses. A few weeks ago Nestor wanted only Westerns. Last week we announced they were looking for strong dramas and comedies. Bison has spread out in the last couple of weeks. There is just one way to keep in touch with the market and that is through the reports printed in this paper, which are based on actual advices from the studios, and are not written from what we think they want. The studio list, which has been running lately, will be kept up to date. Watch it carefully and keep posted. It's the only certain way.

What a Punch Is.

The other day a photoplay editor wrote that a certain story was not bad, but that it lacked the punch, and from the query of the recipient it is apparent that the impression was conveyed that the punch had to do with sensation. That's nothing like it. A story "has a punch" when it grips the spectator and it is as possible for a wholly polite society play to possess a punch as it is for the most bloodcurdling Western melodrama. When a story lacks a punch it means that the plot is not pointed up or is the sort of plot that cannot be pointed up. Did you never see a story that left you thinking what a great story it might have been if it had been handled differently? That's the story that lacks the punch.

Sex in Photoplay.

Did it occur to you that photoplays have sex? They have.

It makes a good second classification following the determination as to whether you have a comedy, a drama or a tragedy. Figure out next whether you have a masculine, a feminine story or one that is both.

Suppose, for instance, that you have a story in which the leading part is that played by a man. You would not send that to the Victor Company which insists that the accepted scripts shall be such as shall afford Miss Florence Lawrence proper opportunity. Other companies feature their leading men above their women, while others want two parts of equal prominence or can use stories featuring either a man or a woman.

Study out which use which, and this knowledge will help decide the first point of call.

He Won't Sit Down.

William Lord Wright refuses to take the back seat we have carefully cushioned, but wants to come out and argue some more about the magazine writer and the photoplay. From what he says and what we think we deduce he does not make the same argument that we do. Here is our flat-footed proposition:

(a) The average high-priced magazine writer cannot write a photoplay for the simple reason that he trusts to his style rather than to his idea.

(b) The Novice stands a better chance since he lacks style, and is compelled to give action in default of style.

(c) Some writers of magazine fiction can write some good photoplays.

With this preamble here are some useful hints from the man from Ohio. He says, in part.

> I have written probably thirty successful photoplays in the last year. Maybe I could have landed more had I had more time—maybe with more time I would have landed less. However, the shortest time per photoplay was three hours. I think you are the only man in the business to-day who can turn out a photoplay in an hour, unless it is Giles R. Warren. I have been turning out magazine fiction, special stuff, etc., for the past eighteen years. The lowest price I ever got for straight fiction was a cent a word. The first photoplay I ever wrote was taken from a magazine story I had written a year before. It was bought by George Newnes (of the Strand), and was entitled "The Poacher's Daughter." It ran 4,600 words, and brought me $46.00. In looking over some old stories I fell upon it and it suggested another idea. I labeled the new one "For the Sunday Edition," and sold it to the Imp company for $25, making $71 for the story. I did not infringe on the original story, for what I used was mostly the stuff I threw out of the original and I reworked the idea. I do not believe that I would have tackled photoplay unless I had first grown used to swinging plots in fiction. That is the reason I contend that, all other things being equal, a successful writer of fiction should make a success in the script field.
> While it is true that many fair writers of fiction have failed in the photoplay game, just as they have failed in the magazine field, it is also true that many photoplay writers would fail if they tried magazine fiction. To me photoplay and fiction writing are closely related. Maybe I am an exception. I believe, too, that such writers as Eugene Wood, Brand Whitlock, B. M. Bower, George Randolph Chester and the rest of the topnotchers are not interested in the script game because they have contracts ahead for all they can do in the fiction field.

When you come right down to it, we think that Mr. Wright has come over to our side. From his own experience he knows that he can sell a fiction story and have enough left over to make into a photoplay. That sounds foolish, but we've written two 20,000 word novelettes from the same theme and have not written the original story yet. But we contend that Mr. Wright is not a magazinist in the sense in which we mean the term. He is a newspaper man who can turn out fiction or photoplay indiscriminately. If he always gets a cent a word he most assuredly has style, but it is something more than style that sells his story, because he can write photoplays and this means that he can write action. With the possible exception of B. M Bower—and she is an exception to any rule—we would like to wager that any of the authors he mentions, writing under another name than their own, could not sell thirty scripts in their first or fifth year. We do not say that magazine writers cannot write photoplay. We say, and we base our opinion on actual work, produced and not produced, that the average magazine writer, the sort of writer Mr. Wright seems to have in mind, cannot do as well as some people would who could not get their stories into any magazine.

We'll add this: We think that some of these photoplaywrights will, in the course of time, drift over into the better paid magazine field because they will have developed literary style in addition to an almost invaluable appreciation of the need for action. We think that Mr. Wright, in attempting to traverse our opinion in the main agrees with us.

And a word about writing a script in one hour or three. Turn back a couple of weeks to what William H. Kitchell said about having the idea all thought out. That's why we can come into our office at half past eight (in the morning) and go uptown an hour later with a script ready to mail. That's the secret of the script-an-hour—some-hours.

Be Your Own Editor.

How do you go about fixing up your plays? Be your own editor. It's not at all as hard as it sounds

In the first place you will need to approach your script with a fresh mind. Don't merely shuffle the sheets to get page one to the top and go right at it. Put it away in camphor or moth balls and let it rest for a time. Do something else, to take your mind off the story; do a couple of other stories if there is time, then come back to the one in question and pick it up again.

Pretend you don't know what it's all about. Make the script tell you the entire story. You know perfectly well that Grace doesn't want to marry Jack because she knows he drinks, but have you made that clear in your script, or have you taken it for granted, because you know?

Half the trouble with half the scripts arises from the fact that the author does not stop to realize that the editor could make more money in vaudeville as a mind reader than in the studio could he do what he is expected to do.

Make absolutely certain that the script tells the entire story and tells it clearly. Don't write in the synopsis that Jane leaves home because she thinks her husband doesn't love her and then forget to put the same thing in the script of action. Tell it both places. Of course the editor can put it in, but figure out the difference between "can" and "will." The editor can, but the chances are that he won't. Do it yourself. That's what you are being paid for.

After you have made certain that you really have told your story, make sure that you've told all the story and no more than the story. Look it over from the point of view of the outsider. Every mother's baby is the prettiest in the world to its parents, but you want to lose the maternal or paternal instinct for a time and stand off and see what an ill-formed youngster you have created. The plot is hunchbacked and the action has a club foot. Its shape is that of a monstrosity and the psychology is cross-eyed. Get so far back from it that you can see these defects as clearly as others can. It will not be easy at first, but it can be done. If you can't find faults yourself, call in some friend to help. They are there and it is better that you should locate them than that some coldly callous editor should be the first to note that the wonderful sacrifice of Mabel when she slips poor George a check is no less than forgery when you come right down to it, since papa wasn't around to sign the check and Mabel saved him the trouble.

Make certain that the interest is rightly placed, that the hero or heroine can win and hold the sympathy of the audience, that the heavy is sufficiently villainous in a polite way, so that he will be properly despised. Look to your minor characters, to see that they wear halos or cloven hoofs as the situations calls for and then go to the action.

Take the movement of the plot in detail, scene by scene. You would not write a scene in which a man gets knocked down by an automobile before the car comes into the scene, but now and then you'll find that through bad plotting you will show the effect before the cause. Get the incidents to lie straight, each event following the other in proper sequence.

If the incidents are all in their proper order then make certain that they are probable. If you've sent the hero up in an aeroplane don't have him come down in an airship unless you've shown where the transfer was made. Get the smaller things to match up in the same way.

And after that's all done make certain that you've got all there is in the idea to the surface. Get all the dramatic points where the director can't help see them. He'll probably be able to get them even if you forget to make them plain, but if you do make them plain it will be easier for him and more profitable for you. Keep at it until you feel certain that it can't be made better, but don't fuss over it so long that you've edited all the strength out of it.

In the course of time you'll learn to edit before you begin to write a story and then you won't have to wory about it so much.

Explanations.

We have been asked to find fault with Lawrence McClosky, of the Lubin Company, because he has dropped the explanatory rejection slip in favor of the straight form used by the company for a couple of years. We do not see that the request is in order. In the first place the simple form of rejection that states that a script is returned because it has not been found available is amply sufficient to cover all the demands of courtesy. In the second place the checked rejection slips are useful only when they are intelligently done. Without particular reference to the Lubin Company, which does not appear to be included in the list, a correspondent offers some reasonable objection to some objections. He writes:

> While I thoroughly appreciate the courtesy of practically all photoplay editors, it is, in some cases, difficult to speak of their helpful hints without a smile.
> For instance the editor of a certain company recently returned one of my scripts with the words "Old idea" typed upon it. A week later the company released a comedy based upon a bewhiskered vaudeville gag.
> Another editor returned a script, informing me that it was too melodramatic. The company previously had released a story in which the unfortunate leading man had been compelled to puncture his good left arm that he might, with his heart's blood, create a red rag with which to flag the onrushing express, though it is probable that any engineer, observing a man standing on the track and waving a white pocket handkerchief would have gathered that something was wrong.
> It is fortunate, perhaps that the Vitagraph does not give its reasons for rejection, for how could an editor expect to be believed when he wrote that the cast was too large and then produced a photoplay with John Bunny in the lead?

The vaudeville joke mentioned was originated about twelve years ago but was even then based upon a most older joke and while undoubtedly the script was rejected by the editor because the theme was old, the explanation did not fully cover the ground.

The checked rejection slip is useful only when the editor can clearly and helpfully explain his reasons for rejection. It is not the check itself, but the intelligence behind the mark that counts in helping the photoplaywright. We note that Mr. McClosky has planned his slip to leave ample space at the bottom for further explanation where an explanation seems to be warranted, and in the meantime the plain slip is to be preferred to that erroneously checked, and we fail to see that the writer makes good his point that the Lubin Company is discourteous in abandoning the checked slip.

The Envelope.

The other day Harry O. Hoyt, who writes photoplays when he is not directing the destines of a street railway company, sent us a script in a linen envelope. These are common enough in England and Canada where they are used for the over seas trip, but rather uncommon here: Comment brought out this response:

> They are the best envelopes I ever used. The script never gets creased in them. I find the post office clerks injure more scripts of mine than a whole flock of editors.

The linen envelope is not proprietary so we have no scruples in recommending them, but there are other forms of cover that do as well and it would be well to give some attention to these matters. What Mr. Hoyt says is very true. The postal clerks do the best they can, but in the very order of things they must handle mail matter quickly and there is no time to handle with care unusual sized envelopes. The stiff linen resists bending to a large extent, and so saves the contents from being mussed, but any stiff envelope of the proper size will answer, so that the stiffening is in the material and not in the sizing or the load. The sizing is the pasty matter used to make limp fibre stiff. The load is clay mixed with the fibre to make it heavy. Neither is resistant and when they are used in a larger size than is common the making of the package of mail results in the larger envelope being folded down over the others, with the result that the manuscript is creased.

The practise of using an envelope that will receive the paper folded only once across is a bad one. This is all right for fiction writers who send out stories in excess of 5,000 words, but for the three to five sheet photoplay a ten and eleven envelope, one inside of the other, is very much better, the paper being folded twice. This will "stack" with the usual package of mail without becoming crushed, if the envelope is the proper material, and will carry safely any distance where a white envelope, loaded with clay, will break open on the edges, exposing the script to dirt and other damage.

A white envelope looks better than a manila, but it lacks the strength of the colored envelope. It looks well because it is short fibre loaded down with clay. If the envelope is creased the short fibre breaks and the envelope opens wide. This is particularly the case where the same sized envelope is used for going and return, the return envelope being folden twice to get it within the other. A railway mail clerk once explained that he sent his scripts wrapped in brown paper because he had seen so many white envelopes tear open. He was in a position to know, but he did not carry his investigation further than that.

A good manila should cost fifty cents a hundred. That means one cent for each dispatch (2 envelopes). The linen envelopes cost more, but if, once in ten times they save a script from injury, they more than repay their cost. Pay some attention to the package. The grocer finds it well worth while. Why not you?

INQUIRIES

NOTE—No questions can be answered by mail. A list of studio addresses will be sent for a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

K. W. C.—Mr. C. B. Hoadley has kindly hunted up the answers to your questions. Mrs. Cherry and Miss Sadie Duff were the schemers in Powers' "The Schemers," and John Charles played opposite Miss Ethel Elder.

RICHARD ROE.—Paul Panzer is still with Pathe. It was he who played the Chinaman in "Sing Lee and the Bad Man."

W. A. McC.—Jack Smith is named by Pathe Freres as the milkman's boy in "The Lost Necklace."

H. A. S.—If interested in questions of identity you should read this department every week. Then you would have seen that we announced Miss Gertrude Robinson as authority for the statement that she played Pippa in the Biograph's "Pippa Passes." Just in passing, your French is a little worse than our own. We do not believe that there is any chance of a revival of "Pippa Passes" on this side of the water, though just now the Biograph is re-issuing many of its films of from two to four years ago for Great Britain.

A. C.—William Duncan was the detective in Selig's "Exposed by the Distagraph," and also was Running Deer in the same company's "When the Heart Calls."

M. C.—We would like to be obliging, but we want something more definite than "the man with the white waist on in the win room off the picture called "The Princess of Lorraine." The player's name you mention is not familiar to us.

M. M. W.—Almost we are getting tired of answering this same question week after week, but no company, licensed, independent or wildcat, takes amateur players even when they have talent and good personality. There is no reason why they should. They can take their pick of several thousand professional and well trained actors who will be willing to work for about the same salary that you would expect. With this the case, of what use would it be to take some raw amateur into the studio to be laboriously trained to the work the professional is already qualified for? You have to be a regular actor to realize what salary fifty-two weeks a year means, but with that for a bait the picture companies can take their pick of experienced people. There is not one chance in a million that you would be able to get into a company—and we wouldn't give much for that millionth chance.

E. H. H.—The Lubin Company is cut up into sections, each of which produces along certain lines. The company which Mr. Johnson heads, and directs as well, is expected to do serious work, the comedies being put on mostly by Arthur D. Hotaling and William Louis. Mr. Johnson's company is not formed for comedy purposes and we do not think that they will essay many comedies.

RICHARD ROE.—The Shamrock does not release under any combination, and we do not know how regularly they release. Double exposure is rather too complicated to be briefly explained and we did not see the reel you offer as an example, but as a rule the work is done by counting the revolutions of the camera crank. the action during the second exposure being timed by the number of turns made. As the same film is being run through the camera it follows that by keeping track of the turns you know about where the scene is. If, at the twentieth turn, Jack starts to drop dead at a point marked on the floor, it follows that if in the second run the double pretends to strike Jack at the twentieth turn and stands in the proper place, the combined exposures will show the blow and it's result. Usually in the second exposure, a black cloth masks the scene and the player is dressed in light clothes. Sometimes the floor is all marked out with routes and numbered spots. Methods vary, but all are based on the act that one turn of the crank passes an exact amount of film past the shutter. The rest is a matter of nice planning and rehearsal.

M. L.—We do not recommend any particular make of typewriter paper for use in photoplay work. Get a good grade of paper from any reputable stationer. Be sure that it is 8½ by 11, of good surface and sufficiently opaque to prevent the writing on the under page from showing through. That's all. It does not matter what the water mark may be. If you use much and can get to a wholesale house, buy a ream of 17 by 22 and have it cut into fourths. An extra charge is made for the cuts, but at that you will save money. For the carbon copy it is well to use a cheap yellow sheet. Then when you get the paper in the machine, you know something is wrong if the carbon sheet is on top.

G. C.—The Edison player whose picture you send, is Richard Neil as Jim, in "A Test of Friendship." In the company's cast for "Out of the Deep," he is cast as An Old Mariner, who in the story of piracy was the husband of the woman abducted. We understood your earlier question to refer to Essanay's "Out of the Depths," but this should straighten out the matter.

T. B. S.—Winnie, in Edison's "Winnie's Dance," is Miss Gertrude McCoy.

M. E. T.—Miss Helen Marten left the Lubin Company when the comedy section returned from Jacksonville a couple of months ago. It was then understood that she would return to Eclair, but we have not seen her cast recently.

P. T.—Haven't you made a mistake in the company in "Eyes that See Not?" We have that title credited to Powers and Rex, but not to Solax. If you mean the Rex production, the more recent of the two, Phillips Smalley and Miss Lois Weber had the leads. Imp is working in California and in the New York Studio. Miss Mary Pickford is a Biograph player. Miss Margaret Snow played the title in the Thanhauser "She."

F. H.—You've probably seen one question answered in the last Inquiries. Miss Wayne was not the girl in "The Cattle King's Daughter." It was another Biograph player, but not Miss Mabel Normand, as some have supposed.

M. H.—If you've been reading the articles in the Photoplay Department, surely you must have seen the recent list of addresses, together with the names of the editors and the present wants of each studio. After this please address your inquiries to the home office and not to Chicago.

LeR. C.—We know nothing whatever regarding the company you mention, and cannot advise you. The statement was given as a matter of news, each reader being left to exercise his individual judgment.

J. C.—We have asked that a sample copy be sent you as the most satisfactory answer.

Comments on the Films

"THE ANGEL AND THE STRANDED TROUPE" (Edison), June 12.—The Edison Company here appears as a troupe whose last appearance was to a house, the receipts of which were $4.30. Marc McDermott plays the heavy, and upholds the best understood traditions of what real actors do and how they act when no one can be induced to pay real money to see them act. The utter despair in which he kissed good-bye to his last coin as he saw it going into the pot to "stake" the comedian, Edward O'Connor, about to undertake a poker match with the unrelenting hotel man, is worth the price of admission. The look of despair becomes one of horror as he sees the comedian, after fair sailing, cleaned out, even to watch and chain. Charles Ogle, in the guise of angel, comes to the rescue. The whole reel is in Edison's best style.

"THE OLD STAGE COACH" (Selig), June 11.—A drama with not much of a plot, but made interesting by reason of the fine scenery, of winding, hard roads over which rapidly travel four-horse coaches, and of a miniature Wild West show containing a few stunts. The piece also depicts the passing of the stage-coach and shows how even yet the old-time conveyance is of value in case of train wreck.

"YELLOW BIRD" (Vitagraph), June 12.—W. V. Ranous writes, directs and appears in an interesting Indian drama. Others in the cast are Tefft Johnson, Helen Gardner, Edith Storey, J. W. Morrison, and for a moment Ralph Ince. There are scenes of tumbling brooks and tangled woods. The acting is good. Particularly is this true of the Indian characters, wherein is demonstrated that the feelings of the red man can be adequately delineated in the dignity characteristic of his race without resort to gesticulations naturally associated with those of the Latin race.

"THE TRAP OF DEATH" (C. G. P. C.), June 11.—A hand-colored film portraying a tragedy in the old days. The keynote is woman's inhumanity to woman—when impelled by motives of jealousy. There is much pomp and ceremonial; also a great castle and beautiful grounds. The conclusion, as the wicked, heartless and unrelenting duchess is herself sent to her end in the trap of death she had designed using for another, is horrifying in its realism. The reel is worthy of high praise.

"KATCHEM KATE" (Biograph), June 13.—A burlesque. It may be said that much has been made of an indifferent scenario.

"NEIGHBORS" (Biograph), June 13.—On the same reel as the foregoing is another farce-comedy, with some hearty laughs in it, especially in the latter part of the reel. There's some good California scenery.

"FIRE AND STRAW" (Lubin), June 12.—Ormi Hawley as Rose, a settlement worker, undertakes the reformation of John Halliday, a denizen of the underworld, portrayed by John Halliday. After John has promised to be good Rose overhears him planning to rob a bank. With the help of the banker who was slated for robbery, Rose is garbed in flowing robes and shut in the bank vault. When Jack gets busy with his chisel on the combination he hears something which leads to the discovery that the door is unlocked. On throwing open the door, there stands in a bright light the young woman to whom he had promised reformation. Jack and his pal stand not on the order of their going. Jack shows up at the settlement house next day, again promising to be good. He gets a job, likewise a new suit. By the end of the reel he has progressed so well that he is bringing bouquets to Rose, who, by the way, is a minister's daughter.

"THE HONEYBUG'S FIRST QUARREL" (Essanay), June 13.—Comedy, and corking good comedy at that. The row started when the husband too strenuously objected to the bride wearing false curls. He even smashed a plate. Bride cried; started for home and papa. Honeybug wired station agent to detain young woman wearing false curls and weighing 120 pounds, as the wife had informed him she was going to live with a better looking man than himself. There being several young women at the station, the agent, of course, got the wrong one. By the way, Honeybug's dispatch was thrown on the screen as it was sent. It was also thrown on the screen when received. It was on the same blank and in the same handwriting—identical! There was a hilarious climax.

"THE GUN SMUGGLERS" (Kalem), June 12.—In this drama of the Mexican rebellion, there is a good plot and some lively skirmishing. Carlyle Blackwell takes the leading part. His work and that of the leading characters is well done. Notable among others are the crazed smuggler and his wife and the Mexican colonel.

"AN INDIAN'S GRATITUDE" (Lubin), June 13.—Circumstantial evidence is not necessarily the strongest sort of proof, and certain appearances seemed against the hero of this well-conceived Lubin drama. All the characters do their work well, the more noteworthy perhaps being the Indian, the villain, and the temporary victim of circumstances. The sheriff had little to do, but that little was exceedingly well done.

"THE LIGHT THAT FAILED" (Vitagraph), June 14.—This exceptionally well chosen title strikingly denotes the climax of the story. One of the chief points of the play is the bringing out of the train of evils following the reduction of workmen's pay by a weak husband to gratify the vanity of an ambitious and heartless woman, who insists that her husband must purchase a certain mansion and suggests the cut in pay. There are some strong situations in the picture. A careless lineman, in the employ of the husband, at work on a pole drops a hammer upon the head of a child, who is removed to the hospital for an operation. The men decide to strike against the reduction in pay. The father of the child, doubly angered against his employer by reason of the accident to his child, with his own hand cuts the wires that supply light to the city. The "light fails" in the operating room of the hospital just at the crucial point of the operation on the child's skull. The little one passes away. Miss Rose Tapley as the wife of the capitalist succeeds in her disagreeable part. Phillips, Johnson, Morey, Mrs. Gordon and Adele De Garde all are good.

"THE PASSING SHADOW" (Essanay), June 14.—A child takes a prominent part in this play; she wins the affection of others than the man who as a tramp, after he had been beaten by members of her family, she fed, and who later on had come back as the holder of a mortgage on the roof that sheltered the heads of his persecutors—and hers also—and had experienced a change of heart. She "gets to" the spectators as well. The rehabilitated tramp did not foreclose the mortgage. He did put into the lap of the sleeping, crippled child a check to pay for treatment at a city hospital. It is all a pretty story, tenderly told.

"HOW FATHER ACCOMPLISHED HIS WORK" (Edison), June 15.—A comedy using an old idea. Father has been trying to do overtime work at home. At length the burglar comes. Father doesn't have him arrested, but pays him to steal the parrot, the musical instrument and other noisy things. He does it with glee. The characters, except the burglar, are cultivated people and all are very well acted. Father is played by Mr. Wadsworth; his wife, by Mrs. Williams; his mother-in-law, by Alice Washburn; the girls, by Elsie McLeod and Viola Flugrath; the son, by Mr. Beaumont, and the tramp by Wm. West. It is dignified and amusing, also well photographed.

"KITTY'S HOLD-UP" (Edison), June 15.—On the same reel is this merry comedy-adventure of a society girl. She attends a dance disguised as a man and, later, breaks into the house to scare her sisters. She succeeds, but a cop has a word to say. It is distinctly a pretty picture. It is full of grace. Kitty is Gertrude McCoy; the sisters are Clara Adams and Bessie Learn. The photography is fine.

"WESTERN HEARTS" (Essanay), June 15.—A dramatic love story presenting G. M. Anderson, supported by Miss Bertram and others of the Essanay Western company. The plot is complicated, but never is anything but clear and sustains the interest from the start. Its object is to contrast the hearts of two sisters; one strong, lively and a bit frivolous; the other a cripple. The hero thinks he loves the first; but gets into trouble and finds that she is shallow and that the other, who deeply loves him, is true. The characters are the usual ranch folk; but are extremely well acted so that the portrayal has much humanity and truth. The scenes are well chosen—little glimpses of rooms, a country grocery and a few out-door sketches. The camera work is commendable.

"GHOSTS AT CIRCLE X CAMP" (Melies), June 13.—A jolly comedy of ranch life in which a tenderfoot is horsed good naturedly by the boys and especially he is made the butt by the camp's bully. The ghosts (there was really only one and he was the tenderfoot in disguise) get the fun all back and this time it is at the bully's expense. The quality of the comedy comes from its good nature and from its convincing naturalness. It is acted just as it should be and the photography is a good way above the ordinary. Every scene is amusing in itself and, as they come, will hold attention to the end. It will please and amuse.

"HALF A HERO" (Vitagraph), June 8.—A little country village comedy in which Mr. Costello plays a young grocer's clerk. This clerk and the daughter (Clara Kimball Young) of a G. A. R. fire-eater (Mr. Eldridge) are in love, much to the old man's disgust. He wants his daughter to marry a brave man, a soldier. An unexpected denouement makes the clerk seem to be a hero. The plot is slight; but clever and fresh enough to be entertaining; but the scene-making and the acting are fine. That country store is perfect, and the coming of the fire engine, when the veteran's house is burning, seems like the real thing. The minor incidents are bright and snappy. A good picture.

"A SOLDIER'S HEART" (Cines), June 11.—A subtitle informs us that this picture was taken to illustrate an actual incident of the Turkish-Italian War. In outline, it is very slight. During the sacking of a Tripolitan town, an Italian soldier saves the life of a native child and cares for him as though he were his own son, giving him the best part of his own rations. The colonel hears of it and orders that the child be cared for by the Red Cross sisters and commends the soldier. The picture has many good views of war-times and of the activities of soldiers who are subduing a foreign country. These include several battle scenes. It is a substantial, human, and instructive picture, well managed and photographed.

"MESSINA, AS IT IS TO-DAY" (Cines), June 11.—A short series of views of the city recently overturned by a terrific earthquake. It is on the Sicilian shore, near Italy. The photographs are commendable. The picture shows the city beginning to recover from the catastrophe that ruined it.

"A REDSKIN'S APPEAL" (Pathe), June 13.—This picture will appeal very strongly to spectators who take pleasure in what is artistic. It contains something very fresh, a decided advance in the art of making motion pictures and one that we hope will be widely used; for it is a most emphatic success. We refer to its making the scenes seem to be moving illustrations in a book as an advance. We have seen one or two pictures in which this happy conceit was used; but we have seen none that has used it in just this way or to this extent. We think that, if this method of making photoplays were generally followed, it would benefit the quality of the pictures very much. It would make scene-composition much more difficult. The man who can make perfect scenes in this way, especially inside pictures, will prove himself in very truth an artist. We notice that out of the perhaps dozen scenes so shown in this picture there is only one in which the composition is poor. As for the others, we can't praise them too highly.

Every moving picture is either an illustration of a story or it seems, not something that is made, but the actual happening. At first this seems foolish; but scenes often are so natural in acting, setting and general management that we forget that we are looking at a picture. On the other hand, if there is anything artificial in any scene, the very fact that it is always striving to seem natural makes the fault stand out. While the fact that it is confessedly an illustration would help to hide the fault. It would seem that historical pictures and all delicate, poetic romances, for instance, would be better shown as illustrations, while realistic pictures of modern life would be better where the aim is to make them seem wholly natural.

Coming back to this picture which tells the story of the Redskin's appeal, we commend it for itsself, aside from the artistic way in which it is presented. It is a very well-acted picture, especially the leading lady. It is a more than ordinarily desirable release.

"MAKING SILK HATS" (Eclipse), June 12.—A well photographed industrial. It fills perhaps 500 feet of this reel. It is instructive and tells the whole story of the high hat. Some of the audience were amused seeing the hat grow.

"THROUGH THE SASKATCHEWAN" (Eclipse), June 12.—A scenic only a few feet long. It is not much above commonplace; but well photographed.

"PERCY'S FIRST CAMERA" (Eclipse), June 12.—A farce that kept the audience tittering. Percy is a school boy to whom his father gives a camera. It is like other run-and-knock-over farces, yet has freshness. It is well photographed.

"THE PRISONER OF WAR" (Edison), June 14.—Strictly speaking, this picture, of which its makers may well be proud, is not a drama. It is a slightly dramatic, but always interesting study of the last days of Napoleon Bonaparte on the Island of St. Helena. It seems almost accurately historical because it interprets well-known facts and is quite simple and human. The narrative seems to have been manipulated only where it was necessary to bring strongly out the man's characteristics and to show the petty annoyances he was subjected to. As a whole, it is very impressive. It is set on some rocky sea coast. One would think that the Edison Company had sent a company of players to St. Helena. The camera work is perfect and many of the scenes are beautiful.

"THE GIRL STRIKERS" (Kalem), June 14.—A very melodramatic picture by the New York company. It is set in and around a cigarette factory. The son of the owner is the hero; the heroine is a girl of the works. There is a strike for higher wages and the usual love story. Except in the acting of the leading lady and in one or two lesser characters, the picture has little freshness or human quality. It does not convince.

"PEPITA'S ESCAPADES" (C. G. P. C.), June 14.—A burlesque of the usual Spanish drama. It is excruciatingly funny in parts, because it is so very preposterous. This is just what is intended. It gets over, especially the last scene, which shows the funniest and most ridiculous duel we have ever seen. It is a little vulgar; but the audience howled. The photography is good.

"CATCHING CROCODILES" (C. G. P. C.), June 14.—A colored picture of great interest. These views were photographed in Indo-China and markedly held the attention of a large audience. It is a very good picture.

"ONE MAN'S LOVE" (Reliance), June 19.—A very well acted photoplay whose heroine is a society girl and who has been attracted by the pleasant lure of a rather free life, has gone on the stage. Wine suppers and a gay time with a duke form an important part of her life. She has a good father and a true lover who acts as her good angel. The picture has an indescribable charm. This doesn't come from the story which isn't strongly told; but from the picture's other qualities all of which seem very good. The story's greatest weakness comes from its awkward transitions; the producer has failed to subdue us to the story teller's spell, has not convinced us. Yet he had dealt with much of it in a very human way and it pleases. The camera work is excellent.

"LENA AND THE GEESE" (Biograph), June 17.—A fairy story of Old Holland, pictured with charming grace. The plot is simple; but the situation very strongly wakens our sympathies. This is chiefly because it illustrates to us, in a freshly pleasing and in a not too plain way, the well recognized truth that our own home is best for us, and also our own lot in life is best. The chief characters are two young girls. One is the daughter of a peasant, the other is the queen's daughter; but doesn't know it. When the time comes for her to reign, the foster mother ambitiously advances her own child, Lena, the pretty goose girl. Lena has a very amusing, but rather trying time in the palace and is glad to escape. This lets the princess come into her own. The acting is full of humanity; the scenes are very cleverly made; the photography is beautiful. It is a very desirable release.

"THE CHOIR AT DENSMORE" (Lubin), June 17.—A love story in which the minister at Densmore and the pretty choir singer figure as leading characters. The one is acted by Mr. Jack Halliday, the other by Miss Ormi Hawley. The singer is a widow and has a little boy. The jealous gossips make a scandal of this fact; but the minister comes to the rescue. The pretty sets and the sincere acting gets this romantic story over in fine shape; it is very effective. We heard around us, emphatic remarks of approval. It is well photographed.

"THE DAYS OF TERROR" (Vitagraph), June 15.—A romantic picture of the French Revolution from the aristocratic viewpoint; it choses a duke and duchess for its hero and heroine, while its villain is a minion of Robespierre. There are scenes of palace life and of life in the underworld of the Parisian slums. Mr. Chas. Kent is the duke; Julia Swayne Gordon is the duchess; Mr. Delany plays the villain's part; Miss Leah Baird plays the lead in the counterplot; is his low sweetheart who stabs him because of his intrigue to get the beautiful duchess. In one scene, the mob, attacking the duke's palace, gave a decided thrill. It is a good picture; not because of its plot, but because of its characters and good acting. It has good photography.

"THE PROFESSOR'S WOOING" (Selig), June 17.—A dramatic love story of the Pacific Coast, with its sharp rocky shore and the quietly heaving billows. The simple, straight-forward plot is enlivened by excellent character drawing, which gives the picture its interest. The professor (Hobart Bosworth) is a biologist nosing for specimens along the beach, who meets the heroine (Miss Besserer), a graceful child of nature and a fisherman's daughter. He calls her his "water nymph." She does some very pleasing swimming. Fate separates these lovers for a while; but after a sincerely acted love story they are reunited. The photography is excellent.

"NIAGARA FALLS" (Pathe), June 15.—A very excellent picture. It is tinted a pale green, with a few purple scenes. It is, we believe, the best picture of the Falls we have seen.

"THE VISION BEAUTIFUL" (Selig), June 13.—Speaking in all moderation, Selig has given us a masterpiece. "The Vision Beautiful" is adapted from Longfellow's "The Legend Beautiful," in "The Theologian's Tale," one of the "Tales of a Wayside Inn." The thought is bound to occur to many who will gaze on this impressive work of Bosworth and the unknown or rather unnamed monk who so splendidly collaborated with him in this picture: "If Longfellow could only have seen it!" For a Sunday evening feature no exhibitor could ask for a stronger card. If any there be who are opposed from religious scruples to any representation of the Saviour in pictures, it is safe to say their opposition will melt when they witness the dignified, impressive, reverential work of Bosworth in this production. It is a poem in pictures—powerful, dramatic. The work of the woman who fell under the lash of the taskmaster contributed in no small degree to the effectiveness—and the realism—of "The Vision Beautiful." If one link in the strong chain were needful to drive this reel into the brain and keep it there for days it was supplied by the final scene—the great tolling bell; and on the platform outlined beside it against the evening sky the figure of the hooded monk, his head bent in meditation.

"GOODY, GOODY JONES" (Selig), June 14.—A comedy of married life, which amused a good sized audience very much. Mrs. Jones isn't satisfied with her husband's goody, goody behavior; she gets a prescription from the doctor and puts it in his tea. It works. It is presented in a lively way and well photographed.

"THE KATZENJAMMER KIDS, No. 7" (Selig), June 14.—On the same reel is this installment of the well-known series.

"HER GIFT" (Lubin), June 15.—A little married life romance in which there are two gifts; the first is a $50,000 necklace, which the husband (Arthur Johnson) gives to his young wife (Lottie Brisco), and later a baby that comes is also referred to as a gift. The wife sacrifices her jewels to help her husband in a financial crisis. Miss Brisco wears some pretty dresses and is very pleasing; there are also some charming scenes. It is well photographed. It seemed to please.

"THE FRAILTY OF MAN" (Cines), June 18.—A dignified, dramatic picture of Italian social life. A gambler who has forged his friend's name, is forgiven, because this friend falls in love with his sister. The acting is of high quality and the scenes well set. It makes a pleasing, interesting picture, well photographed.

"THE BAG OF GOLD" (Kalem), June 17.—A Mexican romance in costume; the heroine's silk dress is a wonder of embroidery. The plot is of a well-known type; but there is much freshness in the way it is presented. Its object is romance and, in getting this over, it is very effective. The players could hardly be more pleasing; the sets and backgrounds could hardly be more graceful. The camera work is perfect.

"BRONCHO BILLY'S GRATITUDE" (Essanay), June 18.—The quality of all these Broncho Billy pictures is well known. This one is, as all have been, a love story; but it is a realistic love story and not a romantic one. Perhaps, on this account, it is not so effective as the best of them have been; but it is nevertheless, a good picture. Mr. Anderson is Broncho Billy, of course; Miss Bertram is the heroine, and the usual stage coach and the usual sheriff and posse appear. It is fairly well photographed.

"HER DIARY" (Vitagraph), June 18.—Miss Florence Turner comes back again to us in this fine picture; we are glad to note that her playing is just as remarkable as ever. It is a dramatic, powerful picture telling the story of a mother's heart. She had suffered and the story is made poignant, but has a pleasant ending.

The first scene shows us the poor house where the old mother receives a note telling her that her old home is waiting for her. It is a dangerous expedient to tell the ending of a story in the first scene; for if that is done, the producer is bound to hold us, if he does hold us, by sheer force of truth and humanity. This picture is strong in both and holds very truly.

As the mother in her old home slowly turns the pages of her diary the scene again and again quietly winks into shadow from which the dream-memory is pictured. As this series of memory-scenes becomes dramatic, Miss Turner's acting gets a firmer and a firmer grip on us. It is a very desirable, well photographed picture.

"THE PASSION FLOWER" (Edison), May 29.—There is some good photography in this picture and some interesting Bermudian scenes. There are several laughs.

"THE NIPPER'S LULLABY" (Vitagraph), June 17.—There is a strong finish to this interesting picture—pathetic, dramatic. It is not just clear how the chief character, well taken by Harry Morey, could have been picked up at sea by the crew of a tramp steamer after having fallen into the water from a float in Sheepshead Bay, but that is not a matter that will be much noticed outside of Brooklyn. Leah Baird takes the part of the mother of the "Nipper," and Shea figures as the captain of the tramp.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 25."—There is a picture of a non-record-breaking pole vault at Portland, Ore., of 12 feet 7 inches. The Associated Ad Men hold a unique parade in Dallas, Texas, during their annual convention. Captain Rostron, of the rescue ship Carpathia, is shown receiving a check for $10,000. President Taft in Arlington (Va.) National Cemetery eulogizes the 22,000 unknown dead buried there. Governor Colquitt, of Texas, breaks ribbon which opens the causeway at Galveston. At Havana, the Cuban President, Gomez, witnesses the departure of troops on the transport Cuba. At Norfolk, Va., President Taft visits the German ships and receives visitors on the Mayflower. There are some pictures of a recent baseball game at New York. The photographs of the simple ceremonies marking the funeral of Wilbur Wright, at Dayton, Ohio., are particularly impressive.

Independent.

"A SHADOW OF THE PAST" (Republic), June 15.—A very melodramatic picture with a heroine who had an unpleasant past. Its weakness is that it missed getting a melodrama's usual strong grip on moral forces, by not showing doing something noble sooner. It misses a good deal of possible sympathy. Its climax is in a burning house and here the heroine shows herself magnanimous. It is pretty well acted and the photography is fair.

"THE SCHEMERS" (Imp), June 20.—The schemers are two crooks, a man and woman, and are wanted by the police. It is a summer hotel story and the schemers soon have their victim, a rich widower. The widower has a ward, a young girl, and a son whom he has disinherited. The girl sees the so-called widow scheming to get her guardian's money and telegraphs to the son, who comes to the hotel and soon has the widow snared in a flirtation and succeeds in showing her up. The backgrounds and sets are very commendable and the photography is beautiful. The acting is of high order and keeps the story clear and coherent. It is an interesting picture.

"THE DETECTIVE'S DOG" (Eclair), June 23.—A picture by the French company telling a good detective story of adventure. The chief center of interest is a phenomenally clever dog. By trick photography, and also without this help, the dog is made to do some very astonishing things. He is a wonder. The camera work is excellent and the picture gives good entertainment.

"AMONG BEDOUINS" (Eclair), June 23.—A series of well chosen views of life among the desert Arabs of Africa. They were taken in one of the larger oases and the photography is commendable.

"THE MANIAC" (Ambrosio), June 21.—A very dramatic picture with one big thrill of which it makes a good deal. It is a picture set almost wholly in a railway carriage. A chess maniac has escaped from his keepers and enters the compartment where there is a single traveler, a slighter man than himself. He forces this man to play a game of chess for his life. The maniac wins; but the man is saved at the last minute. It is not really an unpleasant picture, although it might be to a nervous spectator. It is extremely well photographed.

"AN HONEST MAN" (Ambrosio), June 21.—A run and knock over farce. The honest man is chasing the owner of the bills he has picked up. It has plenty of new wrinkles and is pictured as speedy. We haven't had many of this kind recently.

"SISTERS" (Champion), June 24.—A study in human nature with excellent acting and many very convincing scenes. The photography is fine, and as for the story, although a critically inclined spectator will see several weaknesses, it has much humanity and is pleasing. If the development of the situation fails to convince, it most truly warms the heart. The photography is good and there is true grace in many of the scenes. Of the two sisters, one, who was not her father's favorite, had a hard time at first and, unlike her sister, married a poor man. Then fate changed; the poor girl became rich, and the rich girl poor. In the end all are happy.

"THE SERPENT" (Republic), June 18.—A picture in similar costumes and in very much the same backgrounds as a recent Republic release, "The Other Man." These backgrounds are very handsome. It tells the story of a poor artist. On the one hand, there is a blind sweetheart whom he loves; on the other, a countess who has fallen in love with him. This character, "a woman scorned," is the "serpent." She makes her husband think that the artist has insulted her with protestations of love. It is a completely managed melodrama, but distinctly according to the old pattern and is not very effective. The photography is fair.

"TITLE HUNTERS" (Eclair), June 20.—An American story of a lot of girls who made a big resolution to marry none but titled foreigners. It is at a house party where there are five girls and five men. The men outfit an Italian organ grinder and introduce him as a nobleman. "His Highness" has peculiar table manners and conducts himself in such a way that he gives amusement to the men. The girls overlook his shortcomings because of his title. A pet monkey helps in the comedy. It is very light, summertime amusement, with some pretty photographs.

"THE BANDIT OF TROPICO" (Nestor), June 17.—A picture of a bandit father who posed as "a respectable citizen." A leader says he holds up the stage for his daughter's sake. The sheriff of the neighborhood loves this daughter. It is only when the man is dying that he confesses the robbery. This situation has little that is new; but the picture gives very good entertainment. It is naturally conducted and acted. The scenes give freshly interesting glimpses of thrilling life. There is much beauty in the backgrounds which are very well photographed. The action is as speedy as is usual in Nestor stories and it is all reasonable; it all convinces. The characters also are contrasted well.

"THE LAND OF MIGHT" (Nestor), June 19.—The land is where strength of arm and quickness of eye meant life or death, and where there often was no law but these; but where, nevertheless, strength was often the heritage of the righteous. Such a land often sees the highest nobility and the contrasts of such a land give a fine chance for making a picture worth while. Such is this picture of human fates. It is set in a beautiful desert, not sandy, but rough. There is nothing especially remarkable in the plot, but what we may refer to as the lines of the picture are skilfully drawn and effective. It is a worthy study of the tense desert life. The photography is excellent.

"THE GIRL AND THE SHERIFF" (Nestor), June 14.—A Western love story with little freshness in its plot. It is, however, well acted and has the usual Nestor high quality in its scene making which includes excellent photography. It has practically no idea; but will furnish entertainment, although it is certainly not up to Nestor standard.

"A WESTERN CHILD'S HEROISM" (Champion), June 17.—This picture's opening scenes show a thrilling dash through a country, wooded with recent growth, in which cowboys chase cattle rustlers. An honest settler shelters and hides one of these evil men. This settler has a wife and little girl who later proves herself the heroine. For the ungrateful wretch whom they had saved from justice, knowing that the settler has gold, brings the Indians to attack the hut. The story has many of the elements that make pictures popular; but it isn't very fresh nor, at all points, coherent. It is well acted and very well photographed and the final scenes in which the cowboys come, at the child's plea, to rescue the father and mother from the burning hut are thrilling.

"HIS PUNISHMENT" (Bison-101), June 18.—A simple reel picture of the early West, telling of an infatuation of a lieutenant for an Indian girl and of its tragic consequences. The lieutenant isn't faithful to his ruddy-skined inamorata and marries a white girl. Twenty years pass and his half-breed daughter (played by Miss Little, who also plays the part of the earlier girl, the mother) is sent by her tribe to wreak vengeance on the false lover, now a colonel. By her, the white officer, with his soldiers, is led into an ambush and captured. He is maltreated by his own daughter; but, later, she suffers remorse. It is a hard picture; but its final motive is very imaginative. As a whole, it has a quality that people like. It is well photographed.

"IF I WERE A KING" (Ambrosio), June 14.—A pleasing, fanciful picture in courtly costume. It tells of a peasant, a shepherd, whom chance, such as happens only in fairy tales, made king of the realm. The difficulties of a king's lot are set forth under an amusing atmosphere of comedy, between poetic opening and closing scenes that show us that it is a dream. The picture is very graceful and makes a delightful summer offering.

"ITALIAN LAKES" (Ambrosio), June 14.—When we record the fact that these views were very artistically chosen and photographed, we surely do not need to add that they are beautiful. They are wonderful. We haven't time to write poetry for this department and can not do them justice here.

"NO CHILDREN WANTED" (Powers), June 19.—A picture to amuse and please. It gets its grip on our sympathies from the fact that many apartment houses refuse to take tenants with children. Mr. and Mrs. Hopkins have nine, all little. The family has come to New York on the train and have sought far and wide for rooms in vain. Mother Hopkins carries the littlest; Father Hopkins carries the next and they are glad enough that children are admitted to the parks and can rest on the benches. The picture, which is a bit exaggerated, keeps in a comedy atmosphere all through the film. The kids are very engaging indeed. It is beautifully photographed. It ought to please the average human being very much. We call it a good picture.

"THE HIGH COST OF LIVING" (Eclair), June 18.—A two reel feature picture which is, by intention, a political argument and deals with a pertinent topic of the day, abnormally high prices. As a picture, it has much to commend it; but the reviewer finds it the most difficult subject to review that he has yet met.

It is not a reviewer's business to discuss political questions or social questions; but it is his duty to tell the exhibitor just what he is getting, so far as he can, and to tell it plainly enough so that the exhibitor will be able to judge for himself. This picture is partisan. It is no cold picture of present day conditions; but an exaggerated and one-sided view of them, let the wrongs that it shows be what they may. Again, without any intention on the producer's part, it has, none the less, a thread of anarchy or at least revolution running through it. In the first place, its showing of conditions is carried beyond the border line of true sanity into pessimism. Again, it is, at times, violent and full of disregard for law and just procedure. It is so, merely because it is violent. It favors Democrats more than Republicans; for while at the end, it shows photographs of Wilson, Harmon, Roosevelt and Taft, it shows a cartoon each with Roosevelt and Taft. We believe the hot-heads will like it; we fear the cold-heads of both parties will not.

It is a very effective production. It makes use of the most daring expedients, but gets them over in fine shape. It was made by men who had imagination in marked degree.

"THE AUTO SMASH-UP" (Gaumont), June 25.—One of the features of this domestic drama which did not become a domestic tragedy is the drop of an automobile down an embankment. The story turns upon the efforts of Mabel, who has failed to keep one husband, to attach the husband of her friend. The latter is on his way to visit Mabel in response to a note from her when the accident happens. In putting away the clothes of her injured husband the wife comes across the note. It makes no apparent difference in her tender nursing of the husband. During the period of convalescence the wife discovers the butler about to mail a letter, which she takes from him. Noting it is addressed to Mabel, she reads that the accident has revealed to the injured man the virtues of his wife and that all is over between them. The wife hastens to her husband and finds the butler explaining the situation. The acting of the wife in this scene is splendid. When the convalescent attempts a defense the wife puts her finger to her lips. The whole play is well done.

"THE EVIL INHERITANCE" (American), June 24.—The motive is a temperance lecture, with a short love story. The evil is plain, but the story carries no corrective. The photography and acting are good; the conclusion is indeterminate.

"INDIAN SUMMER" (Solax), June 21.—Good comedy. The story is of father and son and a next-door neighboring mother and daughter. Father and mother badly in love, son and daughter object. Father and mother elope. Father advises son to go and do likewise. The acting of the mother when father is getting ready to propose is well worth watching. It is a pretty bit of work.

"IN BLOSSOM TIME" (Thanhouser), June 25.—A pretty story of country orchards in bloom and of city ballroom. Perhaps it is a rather quick transition to develop in one year a city belle from an untutored country girl, but that speed does not affect the interest of the play. The acting of the girl is good, vivacious, winning. The grandfather does not look like an actor, somehow; he seems to be exactly what his part calls for—a farmer—and those who know country life will thoroughly enjoy him.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

GRINDING OUT OPERATORS.—In a recent issue of the department was a letter from Brother W. G. Woods, president of the San Francisco Operators' Local Union and of the San Francisco Theatrical Federation. In this letter, Pres. Woods spoke of the number of operators, or rather would-be operators, being produced in the small towns, where Jimmy, the usher, assists the operator for a few minutes at a time, for a couple of dozen times at the machine, and then blossoms forth a full-fledged operator. Jimmy, the ex-usher, then proceeds to produce another usher-operator after precisely the same plan.

In a letter from Los Angeles, last week, references were made to a "school" which is turning out "operators" after two weeks or less of instruction. Now it seems to me it is about time such reprehensible practices be abandoned. The woods are full of operators of this particular breed; operators who know about as much about projection—that is to say, REAL projection, as the proverbial hog knows about the New Jerusalem. On the other hand, there is an enormous scarcity of competent operators—the kind of operators this department has been striving to produce. Of course, we do not and cannot expect high class operators in the small towns, except possibly in the case where exhibitors run their own machines; this for the reason that the small town exhibitor cannot afford the salary necessary to employ a real operator without raising his prices of admission; a thing it is impossible to convince him at this time, is practical. In the large cities, however, there is no longer any excuse for poor work. The knowledge necessary to produce good work is available through the Projection Department, and the operators' and managers' hand-book, supplemented by practical experience. As to the schools which claim to turn out a competent operator in two months' time, or in double that time, it simply amounts to a swindle. The thing cannot be done. If these "schools" only made the claim that they would ground the operator in the technical end of the work, and undertook to do that in six months' time, they would be setting forth claims which they might possibly fulfill.

The editor was for a time instructor in a school for operators. He took the position with the idea that the New York operator himself would, knowing that the school had a conscientious instructor, take the course and ground themselves in the technical part of the work. This he found, however, they did not do, and having thoroughly satisfied himself that they would not do it, he gave up the position.

I would most emphatically recommend to operators that they do as others are doing, limit the number of apprentices, and, moreover, oblige the apprentice to serve an adequate time under a competent operator, that time not to be less than one, and preferably two years. The man who has served a two-year apprenticeship, which is as short a time as he can serve in almost any trade or profession, not only can he claim himself to be competent, but he will moreover have some respect for the profession which he has thoroughly learned.

Jimmy, the usher, who "learns" operating in a couple of weeks or a couple of months (he considers, however, that two whole months' apprenticeship is a mere waste of time) certainly has no real knowledge of the profession of operating, nor has he any respect whatever for the trade he has "learned" in that length of time. As I have repeatedly set forth in these columns, it is only a question of a comparatively short time when we will have moving picture theatres in this country with from ten to twenty-five cents admission, possibly even higher than that; but that time cannot come until we have perfection in projection, and perfection in projection can only come through a better knowledge on the part of the operator of the principles involved. Steps should, therefore, be immediately taken by the operators themselves to compel an adequate apprenticeship. Jimmy, the usher, should be retained as Jimmy, the usher, and he compelled to stay in that capacity until he is taken on as a regular apprentice, and should not be allowed to take charge of an operating room until that apprenticeship has been regularly served, and he is pronounced "competent." I should very much like to hear the views of the various operators, as regards the best means of shutting down on this Jimmy, the usher-operator proposition and establishing some sort of adequate apprenticeship and system.

FROM DENVER.—Denver, Colo., writes: "Just to let you know what we are doing in Denver. I enclose one of our programs showing 22 releases first run, which is our regular program every week, using the reels on their regular release dates. Of course, no special features or special releases are allowed to get by. Our new house to be finished by Christmas will have 230 seating capacity, and its front will be one blaze of lights. I am more than pleased with the plans for my operating room. It will be 8 x 10, and 12 feet high. Two Edison machines; 70 volt, 50 ampere motor-generator set; double throw switches between generator and rheostat, which latter can be used for emergency. There will be a volt meter and ammeter mounted on the switchboard, so I can tell exactly what amount of current I am using; also the exact pressure. Will have a special lens made for a 23-foot picture at 100 feet, and will use imported condensers, as I now do. We will project onto a white calcimined wall. For a good picture nothing beats it when using direct current. With A. C. it is, of course, a different story. I have been with the same management almost five years and hope to continue indefinitely. I have Edison Model B mechanisms Nos. 80 and 213, which have been in operation since November 18th, 1908, and not a repair made by anyone but myself during all that time. We only use one machine, the other being kept to make repairs on while one is in use, and vice versa. We get the MOVING PICTURE WORLD by special delivery on Sundays every week, and I always look forward for the next issue. I will close by wishing every success to the Projection Department."

Your record, Denver, is certainly most excellent. It is also exceptional. Program spoken of consists of the entire licensed list. Three reels a day, except Tuesday, when four reels are put on, the addition being the Cines. Has that new operating room got a good big vent flue through to the roof from its ceiling? The room itself, as described, sounds good. It is of ample size, high ceiling, but no operating room is complete, my brother, or is right without a vent pipe through to the roof, the same being not less than eighteen and preferably twenty-four inches in diameter, so that in case of fire it will carry off all smoke and flame. Such a pipe should be of substantial metal, and should be thoroughly insulated from all wood work, since is case of fire it would probably get very hot. With such a pipe, fire proof walls, shutters which are truly automatic (by "truly automatic" I mean shutters that will close within six seconds of the starting of a fire), reels of film may be burned and the audience will absolutely never know there is a fire in the house. While your record as regards those machines is most excellent, I would suggest that considerably better results on the screen might be had by purchasing a more modern machine. The machine of which you speak is of the old two wing type which cuts practically 50% of the light and gives considerable flicker. The properly designed, modern outside shutter cuts practically only 50% of the light and gives, to all intents and purposes, no flicker at all. Probably the Edison Company could equip your machine with a three-wing shutter. I am glad to hear from Denver because that is my old stamping ground, and I am probably about as well acquainted with it as you are yourself. I shall be pleased to hear from you at any time you have interesting matter to communicate.

UNIQUE ADVERTISING STUNT.—Spring Valley, N. Y., contributes the following: "Mr. Tom Hopkinson, manager of the Amity Opera House of this city, claims to have the newest stunt in moving picture show advertising. In a recent decoration day parade, he made a miniature picture theatre float, which brought up the rear of the decoration day parade at night. Charles Theiblu, the operator, hooked up an Edison machine, and projected a picture while the float was going through the streets of the city. I would suggest to exhibitors that if they take advantage of this particular thing the next time there are doings in their city, they will see a big difference in their box office receipts."

OPERA HOUSE TO-NIGHT

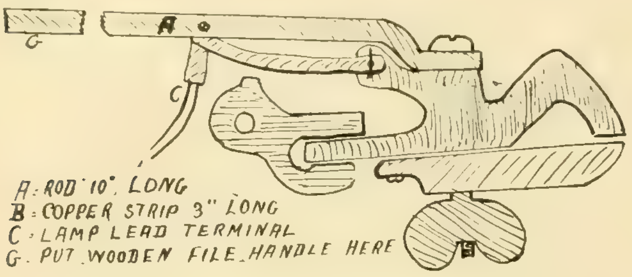
This certainly is an effective and unique stunt and we congratulate both manager Hopkinson, and operator Theiblu on their ingenuity. Undoubtedly small town exhibitors could utilize such a scheme to advantage, and they need not necessarily wait for any special day to do it either. How did you get current while driving through the streets???

PATCHES MADE BACKWARDS.—St. Louis, Mo., sends in a large number of film patches, and a very well made sketch, illustrating his idea of the trouble that ensues through a patch being made with the lower end on the front side of the upper end. His claim is that, with the Motiograph machine, a patch is likely to catch on the apron and cause trouble. I will agree that this might be the case on some models of machines, but on the other hand, if the patch he made the other way, there is a liability of causing trouble on some other makes of machines at other points. Also the above statement of the brother does not hold good on all models of the Motiograph. The sketch I would use, but it is made in lead pencil and it would have to be re-drawn, which would be a considerable task. I think our readers, however, can grasp the idea very readily without the sketch. The patches sent in were interesting, and St. Louis certainly sent enough of them to cover his point—there were about 50.

LAMP FIXTURES.—Petersburg, Va., writes: "I have rigged up an Edison Model B Lamp in a manner that may be interesting to the department, inasmuch as I have complete control over the arc at all times. Current is taken from 110 volt A. C. line through a Fort Wayne Compensarc with 40 amperes at the arc. Now, as to lamp, I removed bottom carbon holder and arm entirely, substituting a holder and arm such as the Powers people use on their lamp. In front of the hinged insulated joint and on to the bolt that goes clear through the holder fasten a rod or heavy metal strip about ten inches long, letting it extend out through the back of the lamp house. To the regular terminal arm attach a copper strip about three inches long, letting it extend along the rod attaching it at the end, also fastening lamp lead at the same place. On the end of the rod that extends out of the back of the lamp house fasten a handle, such as is used on files.



"This gives a forward and back adjustment of lower carbon, thus enabling the operator to keep crater in correct position at all times. Now as to top carbon arm, I removed the back set screw and tapped a hole out for quarter-inch bolt, putting in one of the feed levers of the old style Edison lamps which is threaded for quarter inch, this giving a sidewise adjustment of the top carbon. This last I have seen in the Department several times but I add it to go with the other."

As nearly as I can understand the brother's idea, he uses lever A to tilt the carbon lower arm, thus changing the advancement of the lower carbon tip ahead of the upper carbon tip. The arrangement would be effective, and Petersburg is entitled to credit for its invention. Why use the lead from binding post? Why not connect directly to lever A? It doesn't seem to be insulated.

BLOOMINGBURG, N. Y., writes: "We are running a moving picture show here, and projecting with calcium light. The results are fairly good, but it is impossible to bring out some of the dark film as well as I would like. We have improved the light as much as possible under the circumstances, but would like to get still further and get a good picture if possible. The machine is a Powers 5. Now, what could we do to get a better and more powerful light? We have been thinking of trying a gas engine equipment working through an induction coil, direct current; or would the storage battery be the better equipment, and if so, how many batteries would be necessary and what would we need to get the desired results?"

A storage battery would be costly and not at all satisfactory or efficient. You would have to have enough of them hitched in series to produce about 50 volts, and they must produce at least 18 or 20 amperes, which would mean a multiple of series. You can get a better light by investing in a well-designed light plant—that is to say, a small dynamo and engine, some of which are advertised in these columns. In fact, if you have no power house current available that is the only thing for you to do. You cannot use an induction coil with direct current, since that kind of a device only works with alternating. If you will look back through the files of the department for the past two years, you will find where a number who are using the various engine-dynamo outfits, have reported regarding them. One of these reports appeared, I believe, last week.

FROM NEW BRUNSWICK.—St. John, N. B., contributes the following: "I would like to have information concerning the new regulations which are, we understand, to be forced upon us. According to your remarks the law recently passed in the Province of Ontario is not good. We are given to understand that something similar is to be put in force in New Brunswick. Could you give us an idea of how to go about it so that between now and November the proposed regulations may be gotten in some kind of a decent and reasonable shape. I am sure a word from you would be of much value to us, under the conditions. Now that one or two provinces have started, others will follow. There is no union here which makes it more difficult for us to control matters. I would appreciate it very much if one of the Ontario brothers would let me have a copy of the regulations so that we may see what we are likely to be confronted with."

The law spoken of is nothing very radical so far as its requirements are concerned. It appeared to me to be simply a lever for prying money loose from exhibitors and operators. That was really about all the thing amounted to. A really effective law is very difficult indeed, to obtain, since it would probably be opposed by exhibitors, due to the fact that it would require, for one thing, a re-modeling or re-building of operating rooms. If rightly drawn, however, the law, once passed, would not have to be amended every six months, as is now the case, to the continual annoyance and expense of the exhibitor. The only thing I can suggest is that the exhibitors and operators appoint a committee and get hold of a copy of the proposed law, and see what it really is. If you care to submit the same to me, I will be glad to criticise it for you, and suggest possible improvements. I would request one of the Ontario brothers to kindly send a copy of the Ontario Ordinance to Mr. A. J. Mason, Operator and Electrician, Nickel Theatre, St. John, N. B.

NOON CLOSING.—The Enterprise Optical Co., Chicago, Ill., maker of the Motiograph machines, writes: "We notice the announcement of the Powers Company concerning their inability to send out orders Saturday afternoons. Kindly announce for us also, through the columns of your department, that we close both our factory and office at noon on Saturday throughout the year."

The foregoing is self explanatory and our readers will please take note and not expect orders to be filled after 12 noon Saturday.

LIGHT TROUBLE.—Marion, Ohio, writes: "Am using an Edison Exhibition Model on a 40-foot throw; 12-foot picture with 60 amperes of 105 volt, A. C., through a Fort Wayne compensarc. At times I am troubled with reddish, circular rings around top of the picture. At first I thought it was caused by some reflection from the auditorium, but investigation proved this to not be the fact. Am using two 6½ inch condensers. Where can I be examined for a license?"

In the first place, Marion, your throw is too short to get the best results on a 12-foot picture; though this should have nothing to do with discoloration of the light. I cannot say positively what is wrong, but believe you are carrying too small a spot, or else your spot is allowed to get too high on the aperture so that its discolored edges show through the lens, the remedy being to keep the light centered better. It is also quite possible that the discoloration of the light is due to faults in the setting of the carbons. You have not said what kind of set you use, and I am, therefore, unable to form much of an opinion. It is also possible that the trouble is due to carrying too short an arc, thus producing the condition shown at (e), page 88 of the hand-book. I am not sure which cities in Ohio license operators. I believe, however, Cincinnati and Cleveland do. Your condensers are all right.

MORE LIGHT TROUBLE.—Wharton, Texas, writes: "Although a constant reader of the department, I have never seen anything pertaining to the following. I would, therefore, thank you for suggestions: If I run my compensarc on 35 amperes, I can get a good light, but have to keep the carbons very close together; almost, if not quite, touching. If I use the 40 ampere contact, I can get the same light by leaving them a little open, though not enough to cause the carbons to flame. Am I using more current by holding a very close arc on 35 amperes, or by letting it burn a little more open on 40?"

I think there would be practically no difference, though the 40 ampere contact would be the best in my judgment, even though it took a trifle more current, since it would be very difficult, indeed, to handle so short an arc, and keep the crater in good condition at all times. I think a little explanation of the principles involved will help you to a better understanding of the whole proposition. The arc itself offers a certain definite amount of resistance to the flow of current, and this resistance is in proportion to the number of amperes being used, and to the length of the arc itself—mostly to the latter. As the length of the arc is increased, the resistance is also very largely increased; hence it follows that you may get practically the same current flow with the 35 ampere contact and a very short arc, that you would get with a longer arc using the 40 ampere contact, though, as I said, the longer arc should be the better. I trust this will make the matter clear to you. Doubtless your light company would test your amperage for you if you asked them to.

MOTOR DRIVE.—From Sacramento, Cal., comes this letter: "The following may be of interest to Mr. E. May, of Bartlesville, Okla., as well as to yourself. I read the argument in May 18th issue, as regards Edison machines and motor drives. I am sending you, under separate cover, a photo of our operating room. We have three Edison Model B machines, each driven by motor. These motor drives have been in operation for almost two years. The picture shows how the drive is connected. I have attached it to the take-up pulley and it has been run from it for the above length of time, and never yet experienced any trouble whatever with the casting. I have a 1-30 h. p. motor for each machine. By this plan the motor and its connections are out of the way altogether. This theatre, the Sequoia, has 600 seats. I project a 16-foot picture on a 120-foot throw, drawing 30 amperes, and I claim to have the best picture in town."

I trust that Oklahoma will now feel himself properly and effectually squelched. If these machines run every day for almost two years with the motor attached to the lower sprocket shaft, and during all that time no trouble has resulted, most certainly it goes a good ways toward sustaining the editor's contention. What is that rheostat on the front wall used for?

MOTOR SPEED.—St. Louis, Mo., asks: "I am about equipping my two machines with D. C. motor drives. Will you kindly advise me as to the best kind of speed regulating and what the highest and lowest speed should be?"

The motors should have a range of speed which will run the machine at anything from 40 to 80 revolutions of the crank per minute. Anything less than this is not sufficient. The best method of accomplishing this is to have a field rheostat connected in series with the motor field. A field rheostat, which can be secured of any electrical dealer, and should have at least 15 contacts, thus giving you 10 different speeds, the lowest to be 40 and the highest 80. Of course, neither the 40 nor the 80 will be used, except in extreme cases, and the 40 cannot be used at all with some types of machine, owing to excessive flicker. The speed as low as 40 is never necessary, except on some production like the Pathe Passion Play, and the speed of 80 should never be necessary, except in rare instances, such as an occasional automobile race in which the machines appear to be running too slowly to make the race exciting. This field rheostat should be set flat on a shelf immediately in front of the operator when he is in operating position. If it is placed unhandily—that is to say, in a position which is not convenient to the operator's hands, he would not use it so much as he otherwise would, and all these little things count in the excellence of results on the screen. I venture to say that not one machine motor in twenty is equipped with an effective speed regulator; by "effective," I mean a regulator giving a sufficient range of speed. I venture further to say that not one machine in twenty has its speed regulator located in the right place. Field rheostat regulations cannot be used with A. C. motors.

FLOOR PITCH.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "I am contemplating the erection of a building, to be used as a moving picture theatre. The building will be 120 x 60 feet, and the height of the ceiling will be 21 feet. There will be no balcony. I have been unable to satisfy myself as to what will be the best slope to give the floor. I have looked at a great many houses, and find there is a wide diversity of practice in this respect. I would appreciate it very much if you would set forth your views in the matter."

In deciding the amount of slope to give the floor of an auditorium, there are two opposing questions which must be given consideration: (a) Comfort of the audience in viewing the show without interruption of vision by the heads of those seated in the next row, in front. (b) The natural disinclination to have too great a slope, which involves a certain element of danger if carried too far, and which also requires that the seats be placed on steps if the slope be excessive. There is, as you say, a very large diversity of opinion as to what constitutes a safe and desirable medium in this respect. Any slope you can possibly have will not enable the short person who happens to be seated directly behind a very tall person to have an uninterrupted view. The slope, too, must be governed somewhat by the length of the auditorium, which in this case, will be, I presume, not less than 80 feet—possibly even more. I think, taking everything into consideration, you are very likely to find that a slope of one in ten will prove satisfactory. It will, or should, satisfy the authorities as to safety, and will afford a fairly uninterrupted view of the stage. The Chicago law requires 32 inches between the rows of chairs. One in ten would mean a drop of one inch in every ten inches, so that you would have a drop of a trifle more than three inches between each row of seats. Where a very heavy slope is given, the aisle should be carpeted with very coarse cocoa matting, fastened down securely so that it cannot possibly slip. If the floor is to be of cement, then there should be eye-bolts set in the floor for this purpose, the same to be in a depression with their tops flush with the top of the floor.

DIRECT CONNECTED SETS.—Millbrook, N. Y., writes, saying: "I fully agree with friend Spraker's view, and am thoroughly convinced that the brush, 60 volts outfit is all right; this for the reason that it is a direct connected set, hence there is no trouble with belts."

It must be conceded that the direct connected set has advantages, other things being equal, over the belted set, since there is always more or less lost power in belting, as well as the liability to belt breakage, slippage, etc. The reports of the brush direct connected sets are very good so far.

FILM SCRAPER.—Omaha, Neb., writes: "I have one of your handbooks, and I like it very much. I just wanted to send you a pointer for the new book, and the same to be used under the title of Film Mending. Take about two or two and a half inches of a broken hack-saw blade, and grind the ends diagonally until they are perfectly sharp. Such a blade will be found to be an excellent film scraper for making patches, and will hold a perfectly sharp edge much longer than will the best knife. Some insulating tape can be wrapped around the center to serve as a handle."

I am sorry, Omaha, but the part of the book dealing with film mending has gone to the printer; however, maybe I can work your device in somehow, since it undoubtedly is an excellent idea. A hack-saw blade is very hard and will hold its edge much better than ordinary knife steel. I thank you for the submission of the idea and recommend it to our readers as entirely practical.

UNEXHIBITED FILMS SINK WITH TITANIC.

In an article published in the Moving Picture World on May 11th the tragic death in the Titanic disaster of Mr. Wm. H. Harbeck was condoled. It was regretted that much of his well known master photography was lost in the wreck, but it now develops that the four months prior to his death had been spent in Europe, where he had obtained ten thousand feet of film that had never been publicly exhibited and which is said to have been among his best. Mr. Harbeck had been working for a number of months to establish a complete chain of representatives throughout Europe and America to cover all events of interest with the moving picture camera, and to collect and concentrate the film thus acquired into a periodical release.

While Mr. Harbeck's death was a great setback to the furtherance of the plan, the completeness of his work has made it possible to take up the scheme with the line of camera men which he had procured. The film is to be released under the title of "Argus Weekly." The management of the company has selected Los Angeles as the center of activities, and from there a network of film correspondents extends through this country and the continent.

Mr. H. K. Eakle, assistant manager of the "Argus Weekly," will be in charge of the literary and news department. Mr. Eakle has been connected with leading publications of this country and with several advertising establishments of the West.

Mr. Eduard Gheller will conduct a campaign for news features on the European side, from Venice, Italy, since he has severed his connection with the Ambrosio people.

Mr. L. L. Burns, president of the concern, and general manager of the Benham Company, well known among moving picture people, expresses himself as highly pleased with the campaign outlined and confident of its successful operation.

FRANK POWELL.

Mr. Frank Powell, who is putting on the dramas for the Powers Motion Picture Company, has had a wide and varied experience in his profession, and is eminently fitted to direct the production of pictures. While comparatively young in years his is a ripe experience by reason of having been a stage director for Augustus Thomas, which position he filled most satisfactorily. For three years he was stage director for Kirke La Shelle, and directed productions for Ellen Terry for two years abroad. Returning to America he was engaged by the Biograph company and made his debut in pictures, producing only comedies for two years. Leaving the Biograph company he went to London, where he was employed as director for the Pathe Freres company, producing historical and romantic dramas. Ill health compelled him to cease work and he toured the continent for a time to acquaint himself with foreign customs. On his return to America he was engaged by the Powers Motion Picture Company and is now organizing a stock company to produce big subjects in the way of dramas and strong extra reel features. Mr. Powell is energetic and works at top speed, being particularly partial to exterior pictures with picturesque settings, and the Powers management expect great things of him as present plans mature.

Mr. Frank Powell.

ESSANAY FINISHES "CONQUEST OF MEXICO."

The Essanay Company announces the completion of their great subject "The Fall of Montezuma," a tale of the conquest of Mexico, which will be released in three reels. Only the finishing touches remain to be added to the stupendous feature, and these will be made at the Chicago studio. The company returned to Chicago a few days ago, having spent nearly a month in portraying the film. No inconvenience whatever was experienced, as the cast lived in their "special" train, comprising twelve sleeping cars, a diner and two baggage coaches, during the entire portrayal of the pageant. The preliminary exhibition of the developed film reveals wonderful photographic quality throughout, the handling of the large ensemble is excellent, the scenic effects massive and thoroughly in keeping with the splendor of the ancient Aztec empire. The entire production promises to be a splendidly attractive feature subject from all standpoints.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"BETTY THE COXSWAIN" (Imp).

A genuine Varsity rowing race is the feature of this refreshing comedy-drama. There are so few people in the world, by comparison, who have ever witnessed the thrilling sight of a university rowing crew in full action, that the picture will be more than a winner, even on that score alone. The surroundings in which the picture was taken are all genuine college views, taken round about the boating club of Columbia University, New York City. The rowing scenes were taken in the Hudson River. Aside from the principals, the most of those appearing in the picture are college men, members of the crew and others. It is certainly a fine college picture and will appeal to everyone who has been to college, of course. But the boat race will interest everybody. The Imp Company is to be congratulated on turning out such a realistic bit of action so well worked into a play.

Scene from "Betty the Coxswain" (Imp).

The plot, in brief, has to do with the underhanded actions of a disappointed lover in endeavoring to spoil things for his successful rival. This rival is the coxswain of the 'Varsity crew. On the day of the great race, the coxswain is kidnapped by his disappointed rival and his gang and held a prisoner until after it is time for the boat race to begin. Betty, his sweetheart, has become more or less familiar with scull racing through her companionship with the coxswain and understands it fairly well. With the coxswain a prisoner and the great race about to begin, something must be done to obtain a person of sufficiently light weight who understands the piloting of a racing boat. At the last moment, Betty appears and volunteers to be the coxswain. She hurries into boys' clothing and down to the boat where the oarsmen and crowds are waiting. She fulfills her part to perfection and the 'Varsity crew wins the big race.

In the picture there are several views of the boat crews practicing, and various scenes around the boat club and gymnasiums. The race is seen from the beginning from a motor boat, starting with the firing of the signal gun, to the end of the course. It is certainly a thrilling and interesting spectacle, not without a considerable amount of beauty. Among the college men who appear is the veteran coach, Rice, of Columbia University, who plays his own part in the picture. The photography is excellent and the story is logical. We advise independent exhibitors to keep an eye on the release date of this picture and bill it as a feature when it comes their turn to exhibit it, for it surely will live up to strong advertising. The picture is contained in a thousand-foot reel. H. F. H.

"A CHILD'S INFLUENCE" (Imp).

In this drama there are some of the tensest moments ever inspired in a motion picture. Time and again it is the influence of a little child which operates to prevent a sorely tempted woman from breaking with her allegiance to her husband. This husband is a civil engineer who is called away on duty which keeps him from home a long, long time. At this juncture a friend appears in the home and being attracted by the wife sees a unique opportunity to displace her husband in her affections. So he plans that it shall appear that the husband has grown neglectful of the woman. Then having persuaded the wife of this fact, he pushes his own suit and gains his end. She agrees to leave her home with him. Time and again, however, at the critical moment, the small daughter appears to arrest her.

Scene from "A Child's Influence" (Imp).

However, the mother at last succeeds in getting away. Before she takes the final step though, the little girl, seeing her mother's retreating form and calling to her from the window, loses her balance and falls to the ground. The nurse hastens after the mother and she returns.

Meanwhile, the man with whom she was to have eloped is thrown from his horse and is mortally wounded.

Now comes the most dramatic moment of the picture. The husband unexpectedly returns and finds a letter which the wife had written him giving the reason for her departure. She enters the room as he finishes the letter and there is a very painful scene between them, but in the end he forgives her for the sake of the little daughter whose life has been spared.

The settings of the picture are exceedingly beautiful and the acting rises to the level of the occasion. Mr. King Baggot plays the part of the deserted husband.

WALKER & SON PURCHASE PICTURE THEATERS.

Messrs. W. R. Walker & Son, managers of the Lyric Theater in Peru, Ind., have purchased the Crescent, Star and Palace moving pictures theaters in Huntington, Ind. It is reported that Mr. Walker will renovate all of these picture houses. Messrs. Walker & Son are pioneers in the picture field, having been eight years in the business.

A MAJESTIC MENU OF MIRTH.

THE Majestic Company is getting into its stride as a house specializing in comedy. It is fulfilling the long-felt want. It has been at this new policy of things not much more than a month, and judging by results already produced, it is our prediction that Majestic will soon be famous for comedy. There are two kinds of comedies; funny ones and sad ones. Majestic comedies are funny. They are produced by a gentleman who has a well-developed sense of humor: Mr. T. Hayes Hunter. Everything of his that we have seen so far has contained a logical laugh, which is an element that every genuine comedy must contain.

"The Knight and the Friar."

Here is a comedy a little on the "Robin Hood" style. That is to say, the merry monk, the convent lass and the dashing cavalier are the principals of a charming little conceit enacted amid scenes of medieval cloister life. The monastic atmosphere is well sustained throughout, and by itself produces a pleasing contrast to the modern pictures with which it will most likely be shown. The story tells of the love of a gallant knight for a fair young maiden who is virtually a prisoner behind the stone walls of a convent. Her knowledge of the world is limited to what she has seen through the bars of the window in her chamber. One day a plumed knight rides by, and to her he seems a god. After that day the knight rides by quite often and declares his love to the lady. The old monk in charge of the place learns of this and orders the knight away and has the maiden transferred to another chamber. Learning of the old monk's partiality for red wine, the gallant knight gets into the cloister. Finding the old monk well in his cups, the knight compels him to turn over his cowl, in which he goes to the young lady's chamber. He releases her and brings her to the Friar's chamber, where he forces the old fellow to marry them at the point of his sword.

Scene from "The Knight and the Friar" (Majestic).

"Getting Rich Quick"

is a comedy something on the "Get-Rich-Quick-Wallingford" order. It tells the story of a couple of young men who have been living by their wits. Their money runs out, however, and they are hard put to it, for means and keeping up appearances and obtaining more money. In a moment of inspiration and desperation they turn the office boy upside-down, and take the remains of his last week's wages to insert an advertisement in a daily paper, to the effect that a partner is wanted, having $10,000. Just as things look darkest, a shining mark sends in his card to the bunco firm, and there is much joy in the inner sanctum. Though dying to embrace the boob, they make him wait outside, a la New York fashion. The longer you keep a man waiting in the outer office, the more he will be impressed when he sees you.

They hornswoggle this rural capitalist by allowing him to join their great mail-order business, which is to advertise a method for curing horses of slobbering. The two sharps vote themselves a thousand dollars a week salary, and send the boob on the road as a traveling representative. However, to their great surprise, in a few days letters begin to pour in upon them from everywhere, wanting to know how to cure horses from slobbering, each letter containing a dollar bill for the information. The office is swamped with mail very soon, and they employ a force of girls to answer it. Their reply is neatly placed in an envelope and mailed. It is a card bearing the simple instructions: "Teach Him to Spit." The picture should prove to be a knock-out.

"Papa's Double"

is a comedy that will not tax the mind. It is good for a hot summer's evening and, for a full-reel comedy, seems remarkably short; that is to say, that the interest being there, one does not notice the length of the reel. During a game of cards a father quarrels with the young gentleman who is keeping company with his daughter. The quarrel is a very bitter one, and the two men sever all communications entirely. The father then forbids his daughter to have anything whatever to do with the young man who has been officially holding her hand. The father's edict does not penetrate very deeply into the daughter's way of thinking. The mother also is inclined to favor her daughter, whereby it will be seen that father is at a distinct disadvantage from the start. There follow secret meetings in the young lady's home while father is away, with the full knowledge and approval of mother. One day, however, father catches them with the goods and declares that his daughter shall spend the next few years in a young ladies' seminary, where beaux are not allowed within gun-shot of the institution.

Scene from "Papa's Double" (Majestic).

The stern father appears with his wilful daughter at the young ladies' seminary, which is presided over by a human scare-crow of the feminine gender. She is very formidable, and all hopes seem dashed to rocks. However, the young Romeo is equal to the occasion. His scheme is to make himself up to look like father, and thus gain admission into the sacred precincts of the young ladies' seminary, ostensibly to visit his daughter. The ruse works beautifully. As the young lady's father, the young man easily obtains permission to take the girl for a stroll. While the two young people are away from the institution, they seize their opportunity to get married, and do so forthwith. Meanwhile father has got wind that something is wrong at the seminary and hastens there with mother, but they arrive too late. H. F. H.

FILM SUPPLY COMPANY HAS FINE PROJECTION ROOM.

What is perhaps the largest and best private projection room in New York has been installed at the offices of the Film Supply Company of America at 133 West 44th Street. It was built expressly for the purpose, having solid fireproof walls and permanent doors. The room measures 12 x 35 feet and has a ceiling 12 feet high. There are seating arrangements for twenty persons exclusive of the press reservation. The writers' section is on a raised platform in the rear of the room and is equipped with writing desks and individual drop lights for each reviewer. There are accommodations for eight newspapermen. The projection equipment consists of a Simplex machine and all accessories. Tuesdays and Fridays will be the regular inspection days for the National Board of Censorship.

"BILLY AND THE BUTLER" (Essanay).

A sparkling, snappy, wonderfully original in plot and splendidly portrayed photoplay is this brilliant comedy-drama, and is typical of Essanay's knack of putting out real film "hits."

Billy McGrath is arrested one morning for speeding and taken to the police court, where he pays his fine and is about to depart when he comes face to face with a man being led in handcuffed by an officer. Billy sizes the fellow up and leaves, not knowing he is James Thornton, alias "Butler Jim," an English crook, whose specialty is robbing the homes in which he is employed. Later, Billy is a guest at a week-end house party given by his wealthy friend, Lawton. Meanwhile, Thornton has obtained the position of butler in Lawton's home. Billy sees him, tries to think where he has seen the face before, but cannot place him. That evening Thornton and his confederate plan to rob the house, while the guests are at dinner. Billy detects them, but they overpower him and lock him in the bathroom. He cleverly manages to escape by knocking the hinge-pins from the door, pursues the crooks out across the lawn and is putting up a brave fight to keep them from escaping in a waiting auto when a policeman arrives. Thornton manages to make the officer think Billy is the crook, the poor fellow is handcuffed in spite of vigorous protests, and the crooks make good their escape in the car. Lawton and the guests now arrive on the scene, Billy's identity is proven and the thieves are pursued in another auto and captured after a revolver battle. Meanwhile, Billy is still handcuffed back at the Lawton residence, and is in misery until the police get back and liberate him. The stolen loot is restored to Lawton, and Billy is once more the hero of the hour.

Scene from "Billy and the Butler" (Essanay).

The plot is refreshingly original, and the Essanay Company has made a masterpiece production of the story in every way. The settings are rich, the costuming elaborate and the interpretation, by a cast of all-stars, excellent. John Steppling plays his popular role of "Billy," with his usual cleverness, Francis X. Bushman is splendidly cast as Lawton, the millionaire; Walter Hitchcock does effective work in the role of the bungling police officer, and others who give good account of themselves, are Martha Russell, Helen Dunbar, Dolores Cassinelli, Harry Cashman and Joseph Allen. The two crooks are played by Dwight Mead and William Mason.

The photography throughout is uniformly excellent and rich in beautiful tonal values. The production is booked for release June 25th.

"BRONCHO BILLY AND THE INDIAN MAID" (Essanay).

This gripping drama is another of the great Western series originated by G. M. Anderson, known the world over for his character-creation of "Broncho Billy," and is a distinct feature.

Bart McGrew, a rascally schemer, endeavors to secure an old Indian chief's signature to a deed that will give him thousands of acres of valuable land owned by the tribe. Laughing Fawn, the chief's daughter, suspects Bart of treachery and takes her father away before he signs. Later McGrew finds the old Indian in the town saloon trying to buy whiskey, secures a bottle of liquor, gets him in the back room, plies him with the fiery stuff until he is intoxicated, then endeavors to secure his signature to the paper. Laughing Fawn comes in search of her father, realizes the situation, tears up the deed, and is seized by the infuriated ruffian. Her screams attract the attention of Broncho Billy, who is playing cards in the adjoining room. He rushes in, rescues the maid, covers McGrew with his six-shooter, sends Laughing Fawn away with her father, warns McGrew to stop his evil scheme, then backs out the door. Burning with revenge, McGrew follows Broncho to his cabin, and is about to kill him through the open window when he in turn is slain by a shot from Laughing Fawn's revolver. Broncho learns the Indian maid has saved his life, discharges a shell in McGrew's gun, also one in his own and, when the Sheriff arrives, explains McGrew was killed in self-defense. The Sheriff examines the guns, is convinced Broncho tells the truth, and departs with the body, leaving the two to stand watching him out of sight down the dusty trail.

POKER & F
TABL

Scene from "Broncho Billy and the Indian Maid" (Essanay).

Mr. Anderson's portrayal of Broncho Billy is at all times perfect, and stamps him unquestionably as a master pantomimist of Western roles. Miss Vedah Bertram is excellent as Laughing Fawn, Arthur Mackley gives a great character impersonation in the role of the old chief and Brinsley Shaw plays McGrew in his characteristic "heavy" style.

The production abounds in wonderful scenic beauty, and the photography throughout is of the finest quality. The film is booked for release June 29th.

"FIRE AND STRAW" (Lubin).

"Fire and Straw" is the very apt title given to a beautiful photoplay released by the Lubin Company the first week in June. It is a Salvation story, suggesting the good work of the Mission House, or Salvation Army. A beautiful and worthy daughter, of a clergyman, urges her father to permit her to become a settlement worker. The father hardly likes to let her loose among the wickedness of the slums, but with prayers for her safety at last consents. Deep in the atmosphere of vice and crime the girl works trying to save the souls of degenerates. In her labor she meets a man of the most desperate type, but he is handsome, and Mary wishes that God had given her such a man. She works hard for his reformation and her endeavor stimulates interest, until she is hopelessly in love. The man discovers his power over her and would drag her down to his level. The good angel discovers that a robbery is to be committed and the man she loves to be the principal. By a ruse she spoils the job and succeeds in frightening the burglars. Reformation follows and the desperado commences a new life, to make himself worthy of a lovely wife.

NEW THEATER IN GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.

The Lincoln Theater, of Gloversville, N. Y., has been opened, and at the initial performance the seating capacity of 400 was inadequate to accommodate those who by their presence showed their desire to encourage Proprietor Sanford Eaton in his announced intention to give his patrons the best of entertainment. Mr. Eaton is assisted by L. A. Bueltner, a practical man in the exhibiting business, who will officiate as manager of the new house. The equipment and furniture is up to the minute. Licensed films will be shown.

BIG MOMENTS IN THANHOUSER FILMS.

There are a lot of strong situations in the latest issues of the Thanhouser Three-a-week, and the World has snapped some of the best of them, which are given here. The top photo, of a scene in "Doggie's Debut" (Sunday, June 30), shows the Thanhouser Kid trying hard to qualify as an animal trainer, the only situation she find "open"—and she needs work bad. She succeeds in landing the job. The second view shows the lawyer in "Out of the Dark" (Tuesday, July 2), questioning his wife as to where she had hidden some priceless jewels, when the burglars came. But the shock of the visit of the thieves has deprived the poor woman of her reason and she cannot answer. The bottom scene, from "Ma and Dad" (Friday, July 5), shows a woman who owns a chicken farm offering to cook for an automobilist the chicken his car had killed. He likes the way she takes the news of the accident. They become fast friends and then—more.

CHILDREN MASQUERADE.

"The Coming Generation," a Charming Comedy Produced by the Powers Motion Picture Company.

When the parents of Madge and Willie gave a swell dinner and forced the youngsters to dine frugally in the nursery there was an infantile rebellion that brought about confusion and consternation for the nonce. Madge and Willie are wise beyond their years and devise ways and means to turn the tables on their elders in a unique manner. Once the back of the nurse is turned there is a hasty consultation, which results in a plan of campaign. Madge arrays herself in one of her mother's best gowns and hats and Willie appropriates a top coat, silk hat and cane and they sally forth in a stealthy manner. Reaching the street they espy a waiting taxicab and climb in without awakening the dozing driver. Madge gives orders through the tube, the machine is started and they are off to enjoy themselves. Arriving at a swell café, their entry causes some little excitement and suppressed mirth, but they strut in, seat themselves at table and order a dinner just like grownups.

On leaving the children the nurse joins the butler and they dine on wine and pastry, the nurse forgetting the children. At the restaurant the check is presented to Madge and she is equal to the occasion, giving the waiter one of her mother's cards and assuring him that her father will liquidate the bill. The waiter does his duty and telephones the house of the whereabouts of the children, but his message does not come until the household and guests have been thoroughly frightened by the absence of the tots and the discovery that the room of the mother has been ransacked. The police is summoned, all arriving at the conclusion that robbers have visited the house, taken away valuables and kidnapped the children. There is a general rush for the cafe and the children are discovered just as they are topping off the meal with the last delicacy on the menu and the mystery is explained.

SELIG COMPANY IN COLORADO.

The first production of the Selig Company now working in Colorado has been received at the Selig plant in Chicago. Taking this first picture as a criterion the Colorado company bids fair to outrival all former efforts from this locality. The Selig Colorado Company is in charge of Marshall Stedman, with O. B. Thayer in charge of the productions. Among the roster of players are Myrtle Stedman, William Duncan, Florence Dye, Rex de Rosselli; Ed Maich, Henry Riemers, camera men, and Francis West. It is understood the company will work around the Royal Gorge for the present and later is expected to stage some productions in the Cripple Creek district.

FEATURE FILM COMPANY BRANCHING OUT.

The Feature Film Company of America, which has its headquarters in the Central Building, Rochester, N. Y., has recently opened an office for the States of Indiana and Kentucky in the Traction Building, Indianapolis. This company now controls the New York State rights for the "Odyssey," the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company releases, the "101" Bison features and Eclair features. It has recently secured the rights for New York, Indiana and Kentucky, for "St. George and the Dragon." This company maintains a New York office at 145 West 45th Street, where Mr. H. K. Somborn, the president, spends several days of each week looking over the new features.

"THE FATHER" (Edison).

There is more than one lesson of life taught in Bannister Merwin's story, "The Father," which is very carefully portrayed by the Edison players. Henry Bent is a confidential clerk of Price, his employer. Bent asks for a raise in wages, but is refused the advance on account of the high cost of living. But just as he receives the refusal of his request, Price's daughter appears with her dog and demands a large sum of money for her woman's frivolities. At home, Bent is confronted with the necessity of sending his invalid daughter to some health resort, if her life is to be saved. But lack of funds makes this impossible. Driven to desperation, Bent takes some money from the firm's safe, and leads his wife and daughter to believe that it has been given him by Price. Just as everything has been arranged for Bent's daughter to go away, Price appears at his home and is about to accuse him of stealing the money. The wife and daughter interpose and insist upon thanking Price for his generosity. Touched with the gratitude of the young and beautiful girl, Price accepts the situation and extends his hands to his erring employee in forgiveness, as he thinks of the necessity of the situation.

Scene from "The Father" (Edison).

The Edison players have distinguished themselves in this particular picture for the quiet effectiveness of their portrayal. They have possibly gone further in the use of the dramatic pause to drive home the thought sought to be conveyed than we have witnessed in any other production. The picture is one of the best arguments against the beating of breasts and facial contortions, and can safely be set up as a model of effective acting. It will be released June 29.

PHOTOPLAY FIRST, THEN DRAMATIC VERSION.

The Gaumont Company comes forward with an innovation, which will appear in its appropriate July 4th release entitled "Written in Blood," a two-reel production that has been judiciously reduced to its present size from three thousand six hundred feet. This play is from the pen of the eminent French litterateur, Lucius Danzigeux, who has seen some half-dozen of his plays successfully produced by the National Academy of France. This institution is now in possession of the contract with the signature of Leon Gaumont attached to it, which gives to the latter the privilege of producing "Written in Blood" in film before it appears in Paris on the stage.

This July 4th release is a war story from beginning to end. It throbs and pulsates with the horror and terror of battle conflict, with which is woven a story of treachery and intrigue and unscrupulousness that compels the attention and convinces the spectator of unusuality, size and proportion. The dramatized version of "Written in Blood" is to be shown at one of the Paris theaters in the early part of November coming.

There have been many instances within the past year of successfully staged plays being secondarily submitted to the photoplay artist. As examples of this, one can cite "The Power Behind the Throne," "The Tale of Two Cities," "Pilgrim's Progress," "Camille," "Sans Rejane," etc., but this is the first time in motion picture history where a play which is assured of success in dramatized form in the Continental theaters is to be first submitted to motion picture photography. The result of the influence that the picture will have on the play itself is one of much speculation and the European papers and trade publications have devoted column after column upon it.

The Gaumont Company further announces three hand-colored pictures of special merit to appear as follows: "When the Leaves Fall," Tuesday, June 18th; "Bells of Paradise" and "By the Zuyder Zee," Thursday, June 20th, and "The Lion's Revenge" on Tuesday, July 2nd.

MELIES' COWBOY KID.

Danny, the youngest and smallest cowboy in the world, whose magnificent performances may only be seen in the Melies' pictures. See him "spinning the rope," "roping" and very clever riding. The way he mounts a horse twice his height without any assistance and direct from the ground is a wonder.

BASEBALL FEVER IN PICTUREDOM.

The baseball fever has hit the New York picture men hard. Almost every manufacturing plant and exchange in the vicinity of New York has an organized baseball team and field. The Pathe team comprises the staff at the Jersey City Heights Studio and has an almost unbroken record of victories. Charlie Simone, manager of Nestor's Bayonne plant, has a crack team made up of the Nestor staff. These two teams played a game on June 15th at the baseball grounds in Bayonne. The Imp comes to the front with a strong team and is looking for victories and wants to meet all teams identified with the moving picture business.

DO YOU MOUNT YOUR POSTERS?

It is become quite a thing now to have picture posters mounted. The result is that there are several concerns doing this class of work. One of the leaders is the Poster Mounting Company of 305 West 24th Street, New York City, under the management of Mr. Charles King. This concern has been in business for some time and is doing a large amount of theatrical work in mounted posters and, since the picture men have been using this method of prolonging the life of their posters, the Poster Mounting Company has secured a large proportion of work. About all the feature film companies and poster renting companies of New York are on its books. If you want anything on that line get in touch with Manager King.

Whitney Raymond, the popular young juvenile of the Essanay Eastern Stock Company, returned this week from over a month's trip among the Canadian Rockies and a sojourn in southern California. Mr. Raymond reports that he enjoyed splendid fishing on the coast, is enthusiastic over the many beautiful spots he visited while in California, and says he feels fit as a fiddle to get back into harness.

"The Holy City"

Eclair Company Produces an American Passion Play of Great Pictorial Beauty.

A ROLLING, tumbling, angry sea; blackness on water and sky; a raging storm that you can feel. Gradually, almost imperceptibly, just above the line where ocean and sky meet, a trace of cloud comes into view. Around about it other feathery, fleecy formations appear; the light is gaining. The beholder suddenly realizes that what he supposed were clouds are not. Instead there are the faint outlines of a great city—a white city—on a hill. Then there bursts upon the vision the full splendor of the magically created city. Nothing does it so much resemble as a mirage. Enhancing the illusion is the turbulent sea below, the flying wind-blown spray showing clearly in the darkness that rests on the waters.

I saw the Holy City
Beside the tireless sea.

If, of all the dozen and a half scenes in what the Eclair Company denominates the American Passion Play, any one will linger in the mind longer than another, it may be this one. The picture is a triumph of technical skill. It is an effective piece of constructive photography. There are other splendid pictures in the two reels of "The Holy City." One is that portraying the kiss of Judas. The betrayer appears carrying a lantern, his figure dimly discernible against a jet black background. Then enter upon view Christ and several of his disciples, all in the faintly reflected light. The betrayal is consummated.

"The Holy City" is founded on the famous song of the same name and is produced by authority of the publishers. The release date is July 2.

The story opens in the study of a minister. His associate brings to him a Bible, and the pastor lays the Book on the table before him and reads. The distant strains of "Jerusalem" are borne in to him. He falls asleep and dreams. The scenes that follow pictorially traverse the lines of the song. "I stood in Old Jerusalem, Beside the temple there." The pastor is on the steps of the temple, gazing about him in reverent awe. Then follows the singing of children. Another effective picture is that of a double quartet of girls singing "Hosannah in the Highest." They are singing, too. Their lips move in unison.

There were scenes of beautiful women waving palms. The portrayal of the Sermon on the Mount was impressive, as also was the representation of "the shadow of a cross upon a lonely hill."

The lines of the song in places were amplified by the incorporation of some of the more familiar events in the life of the Saviour, notably where "great multitudes came unto Him." There were "the lame, the halt, and the blind"; as the crippled were raised, crutches were thrown away and the relieved unfortunates "kissed the hem of His garment."

The picture preceding the one described in the opening of this review was impressive. It was "And once again the scene was changed"—great ocean rollers breaking over rocks in a light such as might be cast by a dim moon.

The depicting of "Suffer little children to come unto Him" was beautifully done; the children ran to the impersonator of the Saviour as if there were a bond of affection between them. A scene of dignity and power was the "Lord's Supper" and the breaking of bread.

The concluding pictures, wherein the Saviour enters Jerusalem, his beast preceded by a half-dozen children waving palms, on a carpet of garments and branches, and followed by a palm-waving multitude, and "The Last Discourse of Christ," were effective.

Eclair has done well. "The Holy City" as a religious production will rank with the best. It shows careful research and even more painstaking execution. The portrayal of the Saviour is intrusted to Robert Frazer, and he meets the responsibility put upon him. Especially worthy of praise is the work of Alex Francis, who in clerical garb looks and acts like "God's good man."

Scene from Eclair's Pictorial Subject "The Holy City."

Interesting Scene from Lubin's Production "A Stolen Ring."

"THE STOLEN RING" (Lubin).

"The Stolen Ring" story is an excellent argument against the popular recognition of circumstantial evidence, which, tho' very convincing, is unfortunately too often at fault. A package of money and a strangely designed ring are stolen from the safe of a hotel. Circumstances point to the clerk and he is arrested. He is fortunate, however, in having a sweetheart who is loyal to him; no circumstances are strong enough to make her lose faith in the man she loves. Fate or accident solve the mystery. The girl is a manicurist and one day recognizes the strange ring on the finger of one of her patrons. She brings about an investigation and innocently the lady admits the ring was given to her by the landlord's son. All parties concerned are brought together. The clerk is exonerated and the unhappy landlord has to endure the pain of seeing his son led to jail. There are some beautiful characters in the story, especially the women, who are all true blue. The atmosphere of a swell hotel is faithfully presented, and the costumes are very handsome.

NANON, OR "A BEAUTIFUL FIEND."

This is the third of a series of feature subjects being released by the International Film Traders. A strong dramatic production in three reels.

The title, "A Beautiful Fiend," suggests a desperate character; but at the finish of the third reel, we were convinced the "Beautiful Fiend" was none other than a charming young woman, whose beauty was her undoing.

Nanon was a young girl possessed of rare beauty, a strong personality and ability as an actress. She obtains an engagement with an opera company and her debut in the opera of "Il Trionfo di Diana" proved a great success. She gained many admirers, among whom were De Lorient, a rich banker, and the young Renato Guillaume, a young man about town.

This starts a new chapter in the life of the little actress, but through all the applause she does not forget her first lover, Giacomo.

Renato falls desperately in love with Nanon. He spends all of his small savings on her and then borrows from his mother. Giacomo, becoming jealous, tells Renato's mother of her son's infatuation for the actress. The news saddens the mother, and fills his brother, Massimo, with indignation. He decides to separate the pair, but after visiting Nanon, he himself is charmed with her beauty and tries to gain her love. The brothers are now rivals.

Later Massimo steals money from a friend to give to Nanon. The theft is discovered and the police notified. Renato seeks to save his brother and finds him about to escape with Nanon. He tries to persuade the girl to remain with him, but she refuses. This results in a quarrel between the brothers and Renato is killed just as his mother enters with the police. In her agony the mother curses the actress. As if in answer to this mother's curse, Nanon contracts a fatal disease from her old lover, Giacomo, some months later and dies in poverty.

A new photo-poster idea is being issued by the Gaumont Company. It will appear first in conjunction with the subject, "Written in Blood," and will be half-sheet in size, depicting views from the various feature productions issued by that company. The novelty of this photo-poster is calculated to make it extremely popular. Samples have been sent to all exchanges operating in connection with the Film Supply Company of America.

IMP SELLS TO UNIVERSAL.

A formal notice has been issued by the Imp Films Company to the effect that on June 10th, the entire assets, good will and capital stock of that company was sold to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, of 1 Union Square, New York City, and that the Imp Films Company is to be dissolved. All accounts payable by the Imp Films Company have been assumed by the former stockholders, acting as individuals and a request is made that all communications relative to business transactions be addressed to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, Imp Brand, 102 West 101st Street, New York City.

BUFFALO BILL LOSES SUIT.

Justice Gerard, of the New York Supreme Court, has denied the motion for an injunction asked by Col. William F. Cody and Major Gordon W. Lillie against the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company to restrain that company from using the names of Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill in connection with their moving pictures. It is said that the action was inspired by a desire on the part of Buffalo Bill to accept a contract to appear in vaudeville for thirty weeks at $3,000 a week, featuring with his appearance a one-reel subject entitled, "The Life of Buffalo Bill." The Colonel was unable to accept this contract, owing to his previous contract with the film company.

"THE FALL OF BLACK HAWK," A STATE RIGHT FEATURE.

"The Fall of Black Hawk," the historic two-reel feature recently completed by The American Film Mfg. Company, will be given the public as a state right feature. This is due to the unprecedented excellence of the subject and the fact that a large sum of money was required to produce it in its present form.

No other subject can possess more of those features which draw the public than "The Fall of Black Hawk." The great names of Abraham Lincoln, Jefferson Davis, Zachary Taylor and General Winfield Scott are always vital in their appeal and mean money to exhibitors. The subject has other than an exact historic appeal, too, in that there are an abundance of thrilling Indian fights, a glorious stockade scene in which the blockhouse and stockade are seen to burn to the ground. Lincoln and Davis are also central figures in a very unique love affair, which terminates in the marriage of Jefferson Davis and Sarah Taylor while the fort is in flames. The American is receiving offers for state rights and will make shipments after July 6th through the Film Supply Company of America.

REX HOT-WEATHER RELEASES.

The quality of this brand seems not to be slighted on account of dog days, but is steadily improving. The Rex Company has some excellent pictures in store to be released during the summer, but judging from the quality of those seen recently, it is quite evident that the Rex Company do not intend to abate their efforts to produce good film for summer releases. Some manufacturers have considered it a waste of good effort to release high class subjects in the summer time, owing to the fact that the indoor theaters are closed and people are away from home, etcetera. But the moving picture has become so generally known, both at the seaside and in the country, that wherever one is there is a moving picture entertainment nearby.

"The Weight of a Feather"

Is the Rex release of June 27th. It is a story of continuous interest, well staged. There are plenty of plays of continuous interest, and there are plenty of plays well staged, but when we get a combination of these two elements, it is something more than ordinary. Here is a picture that will interest the society matron as well as the humblest working girl, because it contains matter of equal interest to both. It is the story of a humble milliner's apprentice who was sent to deliver a hat to a wealthy lady. The hat was never delivered; in fact it was destroyed, and the responsibility fell directly upon the poor working girl. The working girl wanted to commit suicide, and the wealthy lady wanted some one punished for the mistake, but when she saw how much more it all meant to the working girl than it did to herself, she had the goodness to take the part of the unfortunate apprentice. Miss Cleo Ridgely as the milliner's apprentice was extremely winsome, and she looked and acted the part in capable fashion. A very clever character bit was contributed by Mary Kelso in the role of a frowsy boarding-house keeper in the slum district. Her work in this picture cannot help but be recognized by all who see it.

Scene from "The Weight of a Feather" (Rex).

A Voice of the Millions.

A Marion Leonard picture slated for release on June 30th. It is a labor picture, setting forth the differences between capital and the working man. One of the principal merits of this picture is the odd lighting effects that give it a singular charm of its own. Mr. Stanner E. V. Taylor has been making some radical experiments in light effects for a few weeks past, and this picture is one of the first of them. It is very successful in that respect and tells a good story besides. It is that of a young lady who is a militant sympathizer with the striking workmen from a large mill, which one might suppose to be the principal industry of the town. The young woman is apparently a lawyer or a teacher. She is very energetic and well thought of in the community. The mill-owner has no ear whatever for the voice of the millions, which is, of course, the plea of the working men for better pay and conditions. They appeal to him in vain; first the workers and then Miss Leonard, for it is she who plays the part of the working men's angel.

Scene from "The Voice of the Millions" (Rex).

It happens, however, that the mill-owner has a wayward son. He is disappointed in the young man who seems not to care much for the milling business, but prefers to idle his time away around the town. His father finally disowns him and the young man drifts among the workers. He learns to understand their ways and their troubles. One night at an indignation meeting the young lady leader is addressing the mob, and there the mill-owner's son sees and falls in love with her. The mob incited to fury, marches again to the mill-owner's home and there protests outside of the house. The mill-owner, gazing through the window, observes his cast-off son acting as a leader of the mob. The shock of his own son turning against him is more than the old man can stand and he expires of heart failure in his chair. The mill-owner's son, of course, becomes proprietor of the mill and readily grants the demands of the men, which demands he knows to be just. The mill-workers soon have a representative in the bosom of the mill-owner's family, because shortly after the strike is settled the new mill-owner marries the angel of the workmen.

A CORRECTION.

We have been asked by the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company to state that, through an error, their advertisement in the official program of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pittsburgh was incorrectly printed, giving credit for this ad to the Riley Optical Instrument Company, of New York City, with whom the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company has no connection. To compensate for this error the program committee of the Exhibitors' League of Pittsburgh have had 5,000 hand bills printed, in which the advertisement of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company appears as it should have appeared in the program.

AMERICAN NOW HAS FIVE COMPANIES.

The American Film Mfg. Company has made some rapid changes in its organization recently, adding four new companies and producers. Efforts are being directed toward the productions of the highest possible grade of distinctly Western subjects and three companies are now bending their energies toward that end. It is the American's intention to place three good Western subjects on the market each week; also to add a two-reel subject each second week and to cover a number of scientific and educational studies as well. Some of the best negatives of a scientific nature ever seen will be announced for release in the near future.

"TWO MEN" (Gem).

George Nichols formerly of the Thanhouser Company has gotten well under way in his new association at the Gem studio. The picture herewith reviewed is among his first releases for the Gem Company, which will be released, according to the present arrangment, on July 2nd, although there may be a change from that date. The picture is a gripping drama of garrison life, illustrating in particular the stringent rules of discipline which prevail in military life, and, judging from this case, even in the private life of those concerned. The idea of the story is that of a superior officer using his authority as such in the case of a young lieutenant who meets his daughter. The old man was evidently well aware of the proverb that "everything's fair in love and war." The old man took full advantage of his authority and ordered the young lieutenant to cease attentions to his daughter, notwithstanding that his daughter preferred the young lieutenant above a certain captain whose case was furthered by the girl's father, who was in command at the fortress.

The young lieutenant, during a heated argument on the subject, attempted to strike the commander, and was at once sent to the guardhouse. By a ruse, the young lady liberated her lover, but their subterfuge was discovered by the captain. A duel followed between the rivals in which the captain was wounded. The lieutenant who shot him walked free, according to an army custom, which entitled the captain to have his shot at the lieutenant whenever he should call for it, each contestant being entitled to one shot at the other. The trouble about her love affairs finally drove the young woman to sickness. The captain, when he became better demanded his pistol shot at the lieutenant. This began to prey upon the girl's mind until it was finally ralized that her life was nearing its end.

Her last request as she passed away was that the two men shake hands at her bedside and bury the past. It is a good story and the scenes are enacted within a fortress.

Scene from "Two Men" (Gem).

TWO REELS—Black and White—TUESDAY, JULY 30

Quite a few exhibitors have been fortunate enough to see this feature at the several recent film conventions, particularly at Chicago, Atlanta, Lexington, Cleveland and Wheeling, where D. W. Sensationality and picturesque beauty have never been so harmoniously or ideally combined. Watch the Trade Papers' next few issues for the story and criticism.

HENKLE GRABS PIRATE FILM.

C. V. Henkle, of the Crown Feature Film Company, New York City, visited Toledo, Ohio, the other day with an order from the United States District Court to seize an unauthorized copy of the feature film, "St. George and the Dragon," which was being exhibited at the Bettis Amusement Company's Colonial Theater. A suit for damages has been brought against the Bettis Company by the Royal Feature Film Company, which owns the Ohio State rights for the film in question. Mr. Henkle declares that suit will be brought against the New York concern which rented the unauthorized copy and against anyone who infringes upon the rights of the Crown Feature Film Company.

LUBIN ADDS ANOTHER RELEASE.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company announces that beginning with June 28th, it will increase its product to five reels each week. Some of the subjects will be features and cover two reels.

SOMETHING NEW.

Stern's Poster and Supply Company, 43 East 21st Street, New York, announces a new preparation for moving picture screens called "Mercurine." It is claimed that with the application of "Mercurine" to the screen, gives brilliancy of illumination and depth to the picture, not to be obtained by other means.

CROWN FEATURES DRAW CROWDS

"WAR IS HELL"

OUR BIG MOTION PICTURE SCOOP WILL CONFIRM THIS STATEMENT—2,000 ARABS KILLED AND WOUNDED IN BATTLE IN TRIPOLI

Two Reels of Carnage and Valor

THE BATTLE OF TWO PALMS

THE LARGEST AND MOST IMPORTANT ENGAGEMENT IN THE ITALIAN-TURKISH WAR

TURKS AND ARABS ROUTED IN FIVE-HOUR CONFLICT OUTSIDE TOBRUK

THESE TWO REELS CONTAIN ONLY PICTURES OF THIS PARTICULAR BATTLE

This feature is not a conglomeration of scenes and incidents before actual fighting began, assembled together and entitled Italian-Turkish War.

THE REAL THING: An entire army engaged in a terrific conflict. Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery, etc., in the heat of action, showing the dead and wounded on the battlefield at the end of fight.

Photos Don't Lie—Cameraman on the Firing Line.

New York Herald says:

I,000 ARABS SLAIN IN BATTLE IN TRIPOLI

Turks Say Tobruk Was Their Victory

ITALIANS ROUT MOSLEM FORCE AT BENGHASI WITH TERRIFIC LOSS

Edem Pacha, Ottoman Commander, Informs Constantinople That He Defeated the Invader

Benghasi, Tripoli—More than one thousand Arabs were killed and one thousand wounded, according to Italian advices, in the course of one of the stiffest encounters of the war when the Italians yesterday stormed and occupied two oases northeast of Fojat which were strongly entrenched and held by a large force of Arabs. The Arabs defended their positions with the utmost bravery, but were routed by the Italian troops at the point of the bayonet. More than four hundred Arab dead were left on the battlefield, and the Italian officers report that a large number were carried off by the enemy. The loss of the Italian troops is given as three officers and twenty-five soldiers killed and seven officers and fifty-five soldiers wounded.

Released Simultaneously throughout the World about July 1st.
We Control the Exclusive Rights for America, but Have Only a Limited Number of Prints Coming from Italy, and will therefore sell this Feature without Territorial Restrictions.

ECLIPSE.

THE WAX MODEL (July 3).—Edna, a promising pupil of Professor Morris, having been engaged to sing a leading role in opera, is seen in her dressing room, clad in a gorgeous gown, making her beauty more charming by adding a few artistic touches.

Her first appearance is a glorious success, bringing her many admirers. Among the numerous tokens of esteem presented to her is a wax model of herself, which is subsequently placed in a museum. The Professor, completely infatuated with the beautiful girl, often loves to gaze upon the cherished model, and at last resolves to possess it.

One day he cautiously enters the museum, and seizing the waxen figure, attempts to make his escape, but unluckily awakens the guard, who pursues and mortally wounds him. Falling heavily upon the hard pavement, the ardent lover and wax model perish together.

SCENES IN SOMERSET (July 3).—A beautiful travel subject, showing scenes along the River Exe, views in and about Bath, a town founded by the Romans; and the ruins of Glastonbury Abbey, which is said to have been built in the year 146 A. D.

CINES.

A VIOLIN AND A PIPE (July 2.)—"Practice makes perfect" is Leah's motto, and she certainly does work overtime with the fiddle, much to the annoyance of her neighbors, especially Tom, a hard working student, living in the next room.

Again and again he appeals for a chance to study, but the ambitious girl will not desist. Finally, driven to desperation, he resorts to other means. Lighting his big meerschaum, he blows a steady stream of smoke through the keyhole into Leah's room, refusing to listen to her remonstrances.

It is not long before Leah is willing to compromise, and strange to say, in settling the dispute, the warring pair get better acquainted, and finally fall in love with each other.

Tom smashes his pipe, and Leah promises to pollute the air with her violin only on special request.

JENKINS SNEEZES (July 2).—Poor Jenkins is just about to receive his letters at the Post Office, when he indulges in a sneeze that almost wrecks the building, scattering clerks and public in all directions.

After being unceremoniously thrown out of the office, he calls upon a charming young lady, with the determination of proposing marriage, but in the midst of his overtures develops a terrible fit of sneezing, which causes the girl to flee in terror.

Jenkins gets into all kinds of trouble because of the distressing complaint, and finally decides to commit suicide.

But, at the crucial moment of firing his revolver, he sneezes, and does damage to those about him. Eventually he is carried off by the police, sneezing all the way to the station.

ESSANAY.

ON THE CACTUS TRAIL (July 2),—Dan Clayton, a young Easterner, is engaged to pretty Vedah Powers. Desirous of making his fortune Clayton goes West and becomes a prospector. After six months he has almost forgotten Vedah, and his letters are far and few between. Patiently Vedah waits each day for the postman, and her heart is almost breaking when no word comes from Dan. Meanwhile, Dan gets into bad company, takes to drinking, meets a Mexican girl, and marries her. His money gives out and he writes Vedah that he has met with an accident while prospecting and asks her to send him some money. Unable to stand the torturing suspense longer, Vedah boards the next train, and starts West to find Dan. On the very day she arrives in the little Western town and boards the stage for the mining camp, Dan has trouble in the town saloon, kills a puncher over a game of cards, and, holding the crowd at bay with his gun, mounts and makes his escape. Jim Andrews, the Sheriff, is notified and starts in pursuit of Dan. Out on the trail the stage stops to take on some mail pouches. Vedah alights and is picking flowers by the roadside when the stage drives off and leaves her. Frightened, she is hurrying after the disappearing stage when Sheriff Andrews finds her, and, as night is coming on, supplies her with a blanket, locates a spot for her to sleep, and is about to guard her from a distance when Dan, who is hiding nearby, recognizes the Sheriff, springs out and holds him up at gun's point. Dan's meeting with Vedah now proves his treacherous nature. Andrews manages to disarm him and takes him prisoner. The Sheriff now tells Vedah of Dan's crime and the outraged girl returns his ring. With a newly awakened love for the stalwart Sheriff in her heart, Vedah watches Andrews manacle Dan and lead him away.

WHITE ROSES (July 4).—Mary Fuller, a pretty country girl, receives a letter from her sweetheart in the city asking her to come and meet him and they will marry. Joyful over the rosy future that stretches before her, Mary boards the train with a bouquet of her favorite flowers, white roses, in her hand. A stop is made for lunch at a nearby station. Mary leaves the train to walk down the platform and comes upon a convict, handcuffed to his guards, standing miserable in the falling rain. Mary's heart goes out to him in pity, and, as the train is about to start, she presses the white roses in his hands, whispers for him to keep them for hope and again boards the train. Years later Mary, now a widow, lives in a tenement house with her sick child. She is wretchedly poor and cannot pay her rent. The gruff landlord shows her a letter from Mr. Loring, the owner, ordering all tenants who cannot pay to be ejected. Desperate, Mary determines to go to Loring and plead for time. She is ushered into the great library, comes face to face with Loring, whom she does not recognize as the convict back in the past years, and is astonished when he takes from his wallet a faded white rose and reveals his identity. Loring now writes a note, bids Mary take it back to the landlord, presses her hand, and leads her from the room. Back in the tenement Mary learns she may stay in her rooms as long as she cares to without paying rent, and her joy seems to be transmitted to her sick child, whose wan cheek takes on the blush of regained health. Mary is kneeling by the bedside when a messenger enters and leaves a large box. In it Mary finds a beautiful bouquet of white roses with the simple card: "WHITE ROSES FOR HOPE." Realizing it comes from Loring, she bows her head in the sweet fragrance with a prayer of joy and thanksgiving in her heart.

THE BUTTERFLY NET (July 5).—Lord Roxbury, an English naturalist, determines to go to America to study, writes his solicitor to procure him a secluded place in the country and sails on the next steamer. The solicitor secures a delightful house in the country, but does not reckon on a group of pretty girls who are resorting nearby. Two of them discover Lord Roxbury is coming, and immediately spread the news to the others. Meanwhile, an English friend of Roxbury's who has promised to look him up in the States, arrives at the cottage and is immediately taken for the Lord by the infatuated girls, who load him with attentions and bright smiles. Roxbury arrives, gets out his specimen net, and starts on a hunt for a new species. He is chasing a beautiful one industriously when he comes upon one of the girls, Beverly, who tells him he is intruding on Lord Roxbury's grounds. Keeping his identity secret Roxbury tries to engage her in conversation, but she runs off before he can prevent. A few moments later he hears screams for help, rushes over to the river and finds Beverly with her hand caught in his specimen basket. He extricates it and again endeavors to engage her in conversation, but she pushes him aside, he slips down the bank, and is badly stunned by the fall. Quickly Beverly summons help, Roxbury is carried to the house, put to bed, and his head bandaged. It is not until his solicitor appears that Beverly learns Roxbury's identity, and her astonishment can be imagined. The end of the summer comes and Roxbury prepares to sail for home. Noting Beverly's disappointment he declares his love and is overjoyed when she consents to become his wife. That evening he is finishing a letter, in which he tells his London friends he is returning with a remarkable specimen, and that it has been correctly stated that "the female of the species is more deadly than the male," when Beverly steals in and they plan their rosy future in each other's arms.

BRONCHO BILLY'S NARROW ESCAPE (July 6.—Old Ben Martin, a prospector, and his partner live in a small shack in the hills. Lois, Martin's pretty daughter, keeps house for them. Baxter, the partner, loves Lois, and hopes to make her his wife. One evening Broncho Billy applies for work and Martin takes him on. Lois makes a place for him at the supper table and it is a case of love at first sight between she and Broncho. During the long evenings that follow Baxter finds himself eliminated from Lois' company, for she and Broncho sit outside the shack playing the guitar and banjo, until old Martin orders them to stop and go to bed. One morning Martin strikes a rich ore-vein, collects some samples, hurries back to the shack and announces his discovery. Knowing the claim must be filed at once, Martin gives Broncho his white horse and tells him to ride to town and file the claim. Baxter sees Broncho depart, and, burning for revenge at the loss of Lois' affections, rides down the trail and spreads the news that Broncho has stolen Martin's white horse. A band of the angry punchers pursue Broncho, capture him, take him to a deserted shanty and prepare to lynch him. Back at the shack Baxter tries to win Lois' love, and, when she orders him from the room, tells her what he has done. With but the one thought of saving Broncho, Lois evades Baxter, mounts her pony and starts on a mad ride. She arrives just as Broncho is about to hang, tells the boys the truth. Broncho is released, takes Lois in his arms, and they watch the infuriated punchers dash off down the trail on the hunt for Baxter.

SELIG.

THE LAKE OF DREAMS (July 1.)—A little boy and girl, Manfred and Eloise, whose rich parents lived on adjoining estates, became companions and grew up side by side, innocent and ambitious. Their favorite trysting place was the old rowboat on the pretty lake down among the willows. This they called their dream boat and ever and often would they repair to this haunt, to voyage far out into the delightful realms of imagination. Here they planned their futures, each for the other. They were to live grand, pure, noble lives, always together, never parted. But life would not have it so; time came when Manfred was sent out into the world to make his name and fame, while Eloise remained sole guardian of the little lake of dreams, and still each dreamed on, grand, noble, inspiring dreams, waiting for the day of the reunion, their reunion. But the man failed the woman, and, instead of gaining lofty goals, he sank lower and lower and drank deep of the wine of temptation and dissipation, till finally he became a human derelict, without purpose, home or friend. But the woman prayed and waited and dreamed on, and one day, the man returned to the old trysting place. Here the woman found him, huddled close to the rotting hulk of the old boat. And here it was that she forgave and forgot, and with renewed vigor and pure desire they both faced the future together, Manfred and Eloise, on their Lake of Dreams.

THE CAT AND THE CANARY (July 2).—In one of the quaint, easy going, picturesque little villages of New Hampshire, there are a row of little, neatly-kept, vine-covered cottages, which have been occupied for many generations by that lovable type of New England folk, whose lives, pleasures and pastimes are as simple as the homes in which they live. Matilda Scaggins, an old spinster, and Hiram Barnaby, an old bachelor, have lived in two of these adjoining cottages for over twenty years, and during all that time have been good neighbors. But they come suddenly to the parting of the ways and all on account of their two pets, a canary and a cat.

Matilda's cat has been stolen by a party of mischievous boys and the same day Hiram's bird cage is blown down by the wind and the canary escapes. Hiram accuses Matilda's cat of having devoured his pet, and this starts a seven days' feud on the hitherto quiet little walk. The cat escapes from her youthful tormentors, but in doing so suffers a broken foot. Hiram finds the cat outside his cottage, and, in his anger, is just on the verge of revenging himself with the aid of a bootjack, when he notices the cat's injured foot. His sympathetic heart gets the best of his anger and he carefully sets and bandages the broken member, after which he returns same to Matilda. That night the canary, tiring of its stolen vacation, returns to its cage, and once more Hiram and Matilda resume their neighborly relations, and everything is serene along the walk.

THE LAST DANCE (July 4).—James Norton, clubman and first-nighter, meets and becomes infatuated with Mignon, the classic dancing girl of the Metropolitan Variety Theater. He finds her vastly different from those she is associated with, and his respect for her is as great as his love. She loves refinement and culture, and loathes everything licentious and vulgar. She likes Norton and appreciates his friendship, but will not marry him until she feels sure of herself.

She is subject to attacks of weak heart, and, one night while dancing, her heart fails and she falls in a faint upon the stage. The doctor insists that she give up her work, for the time being at least, and go to the country to recuperate. She does so and the transformation is wonderful. She grows to love the country and its simple, good-hearted, church-going people. John Harlowe, a young minister of rather puritanical ideas, meets and falls in love with her, and she in turn, realizing that she does not love Norton, gives herself to Harlow. The minister is ignorant of her former life and she does not tell him. They are very happy with their plans for the future, when Norton appears upon the scene. The minister takes his departure, and Mignon tells Norton why she cannot marry him. Harlow, meantime, has accidentally run across a magazine picture of Mignon and learns of her connection with the stage. He rushes to the field, where she and Norton have walked, and denounces her for an adventuress.

Heartbroken, she pleads with him not to cast her aside. In order to prove to him that her dancing is not vulgar she makes him watch, while she dances for him. Harlow watches and as the dance progresses he begins to relent. She completes the last step and, as she turns for her answer, stumbles and falls, her heart has failed, and she drops limply to the ground, dead.

BABY BETTY (July 5).—Col. John Roberts, C. S. A., returning to his Virginia home to assume command of the critical situation in that neighborhood, finds that, during his absence, the Yankees have appropriated for their own uses, everything eatable on the plantation and that his wife, baby girl, and colored maid, are facing starvation. Mrs. Roberts, weak from hunger, becomes ill and the Colonel sends for a doctor, who prescribes "good, wholesome food, to be taken three times a day." Roberts is called away at this moment, and the prescription falls to the ground unnoticed by all except "Baby Betty."

The child, with intuitive understanding of the situation, picks up the paper, and, with a Confederate flag over her shoulder, starts for the Yankee's headquarters, which is near at hand. Unknown to her mother and "Aunt Cleo," the baby makes her way through the northern lines and finds her way into Colonel Howard's camp. That gentleman, big-hearted Yankee that he is, reads the prescription, and, with thoughts of his own dear ones at home, orders one of his men to carry a large basket of provisions through the lines to Betty's home.

The following day both armies line up opposite each other at the edge of a nearby clearing to engage in battle. They are about to open fire when suddenly the attention of everyone is arrested by a little figure in white sleeping peacefully in the center of the battlefield. A truce is called and the two commanders ride out to investigate the embarrassing situation. They find that the sleeping child is "Baby Betty," who has unconsciously halted the impending conflict. Realizing that there can be no fighting that day, the commanders agree upon an armistice and each army retires amid cheers for "Baby Betty," the little rebel.

VITAGRAPH.

THE FRENCH SPY (June 17) (3-reel Special).—General Derimond, with his wife and daughter, Mathilde, are captured by pirates. The pirate captain claims Mrs. Derimond as his property. She resists. She is forced to "walk the plank," and drowned. Mathilde is struck dumb by the sight. The General and Mathilde are sold as slaves to the Moors. Mathilde escapes and accomplishes her father's rescue.

Colonel Birnell, a French officer, marries Mathilde. He starts to the front at the head of his regiment. Disguised as a French lancer, she accompanies him. Mohammed, the Arab Chief, is captured by the French. He attempts to shoot the Colonel, and is prevented by Mathilde piercing the Arab's arm with her sabre. She volunteers to go as a French spy. She reaches the enemy's fortress, disguised as a harmless Arab boy, and allowed to remain with them.

In battle, the Arabs take Colonel Birnell prisoner. He is placed in the fortress. He suffers torture rather than betray the French army. Mathilde, as previously instructed, shoots a flaming arrow high in the air. It is the signal for attack. The French forces burst into the fortress, routing the Arabs with great slaughter, saving Mathilde and her husband.

AFTER MANY YEARS (July 1).—Arrested as an outlaw, Malede is brought by the sheriff to his father's and his sister's home. His sister, Marie, rushes in sympathy to her brother and, when the sheriff tells them that the boy has been accused of murder, the old father beckons his sister aside, and tells her not to speak to Malede, as he is accursed forever. Marie, who loves her brother dearly, is disturbed by the thought of his imprisonment. Marie's husband, who has never met Malede, becomes suspicious of her restless actions. A few days later, Malede escapes from the sheriff. He sends a note to his sister to meet him in the alfalfa field to bid her a last good-bye. Her husband follows Marie, and when he sees the brother and sister embrace, he is jealous, and deserts her. The husband makes his way into the mountains and becomes a prospector.

Years afterward, he makes a rich strike and determines to go back to his wife and child. Marie has refused many offers of marriage, but remains hopeful that her husband may yet return. Her daughter has married and Marie is now alone. The husband, on his way back to his wife, is waylaid by thieves and robbed of his gold. Exhausted and wounded, he drags himself to the lone cabin of his wife. Although he is aged and changed, she recognizes him and welcomes him with the love that has remained forever constant.

THE CHURCH ACROSS THE WAY (July 2).—Broken-heated by the loss of his wife and child, John Mason, contemplating suicide, is suddenly confronted by his old mother. She greets him tenderly. Ashamed of his intentions, he dismisses her with a kiss and walks meditatively to the window, gazing at the little church across the way. Strains of music and the voices of the vested choir greet his ears. His mother joins him and together they listen to the comforting words.

Not far away, a different scene is being enacted. Little Dottie Breen, with her dog Jean, is making her way towards the home of her maiden aunt, with a note stating that her mother has died penniless and has sent her to her Aunt Hester for a home and shelter. The spinster aunt, of irritable disposition, reads the note and welcomes the child grudgingly. She objects to the presence of the little girl's dog and decides to get rid of it, announcing the sale of the dog by placing a sign outside the house. Dot has ideas of her own and puts them into operation by painting a sign herself, stating that she is for sale as well as her dog. She puts on her little hat and filling a small basket with eatables, she leaves her aunt's home, wandering out into the adjacent woods.

John Mason, in quest of peace of mind, is walking through the woods and discovers Dot and her dog, with the sign fastened on a tree above them. He takes the little one and her companion to his home, and makes them part of his family, bringing a new light and joy into it. Dot takes readily to Mrs. Mason and her new surroundings, and when Christmas comes, happiness reigns in the household. As they all gather around the Christmas tree, John and his mother watch the happy face of the child as she and her dog enjoy the feast of good things prepared for them.

LINCOLN'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS (July 3).—On the battlefield of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, on November 19, 1863, Abraham Lincoln dedicated the ground upon which was fought, July 1st, 2nd and 3rd, 1863, the bloodiest conflict and the pivotal battle of the Civil War. In the following words, he consecrated the battlefield to the memory of the dead and the inspiration of the living:

"Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

As we read the words of Lincoln and see the visions he saw of the struggles for liberty and the preservation of the Union, we realize their full significance. In the allegorical illustrations shown in this marvelous interpretation, through it we grasp the full import of each thought expressed in the prophetic and immortal words of Lincoln.

ON THE PUPIL OF HIS EYE (July 5)—The household of Senator Walker consists of himself, his ward, Mary, and his nephew, Herbert. The other members of his household are John, an old servant, Lucy the maid, and a half dozen more servants. John is smitten with Lucy. She doesn't take him seriously, owing to the difference in their ages. Mr. Walker, rather old and feeble, draws up his will and leaves the bulk of his property to Mary and Herbert. He bequeathes $5,000 to his faithful servant John. Herbert is very fond of his uncle. The old gentleman is very much attached to Mary and very desirous that she and Herbert should be wed at the proper time. John is anxious to make Lucy his wife, and learning he is one of the beneficiaries in the will, he is very anxious to get possession of the money, hoping it will induce Lucy to become his wife. He is so possessed with this thought that it grows to be a mania and he murders Mr. Walker.

Herbert is arrested for the crime, a knife belonging to him being found near his uncle's body. Mary believes him innocent and employs the noted detective, Tom Wark, to follow up the case. He makes a search of the rooms and discovers a bloodstained handkerchief, and suspects John, the old servant. Wark has an article published in the newspapers stating that the eye of the dead man will be photographed, following out a scientific theory that the eye will show the object which was last seen by the dead man. When the servants in the Walker household read this article the next day, John is very much agitated. Later, under cover of darkness, he suspiciously enters the room where he supposes the body of Mr. Walker is lying. These facts are carefully noted. He is brought before the police, questioned, and then suddenly confronted with the bloodstained handkerchief, and finally with the photograph of himself, on the pupil of the eye. Quivering in every limb, he confesses his crime. Herbert is released from prison and received with open arms by Mary, whom he afterwards marries.

THE TROUBLESOME STEP-DAUGHTERS (July 6).—Mr. Burton, a prominent citizen, blessed with five young motherless daughters, is appointed Consul to China. On his departure they present him with a photograph of themselves in a group. He treasures the picture as his dearest possession. After five year's absence in the Far East, he meets a fascinating widow. He tells her of his charming little girls at home, forgetting that five years' absence has made some difference in their ages and that they are fast approaching womanhood. She immediately becomes interested. Mr. Burton marries the widow and at the end of his term of office, six years, the newly married couple return to America, anxious to meet their little ones at home.

The girls are shocked and antagonistic when they hear that they are to have a step-mother, and determine to show her that they are beyond her espionage and will brook no foreign interference. Mr. and Mrs. Burton purchase all sorts of childish toys for them as souvenirs from abroad, hoping they will amuse them in their play. Arriving at home, they are surprised to be greeted by five grown-up young ladies, who have purposely equipped themselves in the latest styles of dress suitable for young ladies. Mrs. Burton asserts her authority by telling them to dress as becomes young girls, after which she orders them back to their governess. They play and make things lively, making a din and a racket with the toys and playing all sorts of pranks.

After thinking the matter over, Mrs. Burton decides upon another course of action. She and her husband are invited to a dance and reception. She invites her step-daughters to go with her. This greatly delights the girls. At the reception, she introduces them to all the young fellows and makes herself "perfectly lovely," inviting the young men to call at their home to see their daughters. This sort of kindness wins the girls completely and it is not long before their new mamma is their dearest friend and companion.

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 26—1912 (June 24).—Portland, Ore. Governor West visits the State Penitentiary.

Hobart, Tasmania. The Fram, the vessel which bears the discoverer of the South Pole, Amundsen, being put into shape after her long voyage, leaves for South America.

Washington, D. C. A new automatic device for delivering and collecting mail on a rapidly moving train, which needs no one to operate it, is being tried by the Government on the Chesapeake Beach branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Tillamook, Ore. The business men of Portland visit this country with the view of ascertaining its great resources. The U. S. Life Saving Station at Tillamook Bay aids in entertaining them.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Athletes from all parts of the country meet at Celtic Park in an effort to qualify for the final tryouts for the Olympic games.

Klamath Falls, Ore. The B. P. O. Elks hold a Rodeo at this place in which the bucking horse, Cyclone, carries off most of the honors.

Paris, France. New fashions from the Fashion Center in Millinery and Hair Dressing.

Washington, D. C. The Columbus Statue in front of the Union Station is unveiled by President Taft.

Annapolis, Md. The graduating "Middies" at the United States Naval Academy receive their diplomas from the hand of the President.

New York, N. Y. The Baseball Game—New York vs. Chicago.

TRUE LOVE (June 26).—A vivid tale of the rivalry between a poor boy and the son of the former's employer for the hand of a beautiful girl. The latter finally gets very sick and blood transfusion is necessary as a last resort, and under this trial the rich man is found wanting.

THE DEER SLAYER'S RETRIBUTION (June 27).—An Indian failing to win the love of the daughter of the chief, commits a crime and swears that his rival committed the deed, but eventually the matter is all satisfactorily cleared up.

THE SQUAWMAN'S SWEETHEART (June 29).—A squawman learns that his sweetheart back East is coming to visit him and he drives his squaw out. She in retaliation, visits her tribe, tells her story and the white girl is captured by the Indians and the squawman is notified that she will be killed. He succeeds in rescuing her, but is pursued by the Indians. After many thrilling adventures the pair finally escape.

WHERE JEALOUSY LEADS (July 3).—This charming drama is played in a typical country village where the grocer and blacksmith are the two principal men in the hamlet. It so happens that the blacksmith and the grocer's wife used to be sweethearts until the blacksmith found somebody he liked more. Still the blacksmith is very courteous and gallant to the grocer's wife, much to the grocer's displeasure. One day a great event in the blacksmith's house necessitates the presence of another woman, and the grocer's wife responds to the blacksmith's appeal. The grocer follows them at a distance as they go to the blacksmith's house and watches them through a window. What he sees so excites his jealousy that he is about to shoot them both when he finds that they are both bending over a tiny little bundle of humanity that has just arrived.

GREED OF GOLD (July 4).—An intensely dramatic film, based on the grasping greed of a prospector in the early days of California. Unable to strike pay dirt, he gets his dust by robbing a man he finds stricken with fever in the desert. Justice, however, follows close upon his trail, and ultimately he pays the penalty of his dastardly deeds.

THE WOOING OF WHITE FAWN (July 6).—Two Indians—brothers are in love with White Fawn, and think too much of each other to take an entire advantage one of the other. One day, in a desperate encounter, the younger brother is badly mutilated by the foes who attack the two brothers, and loses the sight of one eye. Little White Fawn, with whom they are both in love, prefers the other brother after this event, until he finally dies from a snake bite and she finally marries the blind one.

C. G. P. C.

DEATH OF SAUL (June 25).—This film tells the dramatic story of the death of this famous Bible character and his trip to the witch of Endor, who forecasted his tragic end. The story is dramatic in the extreme and beautifully played.

THE HEAT WAVE (June 28).—This French farce is funny in the extreme and particularly good for the summer months. It shows the efforts of the heat-crazed inhabitants of Paris trying to keep cool. They utilize the fountain for bathing, but the water gets boiling hot. They have parasols, but the heat sets them on fire. Finally, when everyone is in despair, a shower relieves the intensity of the heat.

WILD BIRDS AT HOME (July 2).—In the initial scene we have a picture of wild ducks of various sorts living in peaceful communities among the weeds. Following is a coot, probably the wildest of the duck family, returning to her nest after luncheon. Later mallard ducks building their nests, and the wild swans searching the bottom of the streams for food. And cunningly hidden in the ivy of an old wall the modest wren. The sedge-warbler searches for food while his mate tends their young. The chaffinch feeding its hungry little ones finishes up this remarkably interesting film.

WINTER LANDSCAPES IN FINLAND (July 3).—Many marvelously beautiful scenes of snow-clad mountains, trees and villages, comprise this dainty film.

THE WOULD-BE HUNTER'S NIGHTMARE (July 5).—Mr. Ima Bonehead is engaged to a very delightful young lady, and desiring to impress her with his prowess as a hunter, buys a lot of horns, skins, etc., and spreads them around his house and invites her to see him. He chucks his bluff successfully, but on retiring that night, his trophies rise up and raise thunder with him.

HAIRDRESSING OF OTHER DAYS (July 5)—This is a good companion film to "Costumes of All Ages," and shows how women have endeavored to increase their beauty by various styles of wearing their hair.

MELIES.

THE MAN INSIDE (July 11).—Rank, the foreman, asks the rancher for his daughter's hand. Edith leaves the room in anger for she loves Alonzo. Rank, enraged at her preference, discharges him, thinking that this would put an end to their friendship. Alonzo's sister, Rosita, after the death of her husband, returns to live with her brother, and Edith, calling at his home and seeing the strange woman, returns, broken-hearted, thinking that she is Alonzo's wife. Rosita visits Edith to beg her influence to get her brother reinstated, and thus Edith learns the truth. Rank, blaming Alonzo for cattle stealing, leads the cowboys to attack him in his home, and, setting it on fire, he thinks thus to destroy his hated rival. Knowing of Rank's errand, and fearing the worst, Edith and Rosita arrive at this juncture. A knife thrown by Alonzo through the attic window, reveals his presence in the burning building. Every effort is made to save Alonzo, but he has been burnt so badly that recovery is impossible. Rank's plot being unmasked, he turns to flee, pursued by the cowboys and Edith and Rosita, mourning their loss, are consoled to know that the cowboys have avenged Alonzo's death.

LUBIN.

THE SPOILED CHILD (July 1).—John and Edith Harrold have two children, Raymond and Albert. Raymond is a manly little fellow aged nine, while Albert is a spoiled child of eight. When the story opens the boys are getting ready for school. Albert wishes to remain home to try a new pair of skates, which he is allowed to do, while Raymond goes manfully off to school. Next day in the school-room, Albert throws a spit-ball at the teacher. Raymond rises to his feet in an effort to prevent it and is blamed for the act. He makes no denial and is punished. The teacher also sends a note home to his parents, and he is sent supperless to bed.

In the meantime, the father buys a pony, which Albert, as usual, monopolizes. Raymond loves the pony dearly, and when Albert strikes it in anger, the boys quarrel, and as usual, Raymond shoulders the blame. The father decides that Albert shall have the pony to himself for a week. Raymond, heart-broken, steals to the stable after dark to caress the pony. The coachman sympathizes with him and follows him, carelessly laying his lighted cigar on a bale of hay. An hour or so later the fire is discovered. The children are wild. The pony will not move, but is terrified and rigid. Unseen, Raymond enters the burning stable and, throwing a coat over the pony's head, leads him to safety. He is so badly burned that a specialist is called in. The specialist decides that the only way to save the boy is by skin-grafting. Albert is frantic and in a burst of emotion confesses his faults and shoulders the blame that is rightfully his. He asks to be allowed to furnish the cuticle necessary to save his brother, and the parents consent. The operation is successful and the later scenes show the boys in their new-found understanding and happiness. The pony is unhurt, but another one is bought and the boys ride happily away together as the picture ends.

THE PRIZE ESSAY (July 3).—Margaret Blake, a bright country girl, desires an education. Her parents are unable to provide for any higher training than that afforded by the schools in their town. A rich aunt offers to send her to a fashionable boarding-school. Her countrified dress and appearance place her at a disadvantage in the seminary. The leader of the girls is a handsome brunette, Henrietta Worthington. Margaret, by her sweet disposition, soon becomes her rival. Henriette is almost forsaken by her former followers. She becomes jealous, and seeks in every way to show her resentment. About the middle of the year a prize of fifty dollars is offered for the best essay. Henrietta sees a chance to regain her former prestige. That day Margaret receives a letter from home speaking of urgent need of money. She feels that she must win this prize in order to help her family. A sudden inspiration comes to her. She does not rest until, late at night, she has completed a rough draft of the essay. She falls asleep in her chair. A group of girls, among them Henrietta, come in to ask her to join them in a merry-making. They withdraw softly without disturbing her, but Henrietta has noticed the essay. A few moments later she returns, and stealthily removes the pages, carrying them to her room. She is delighted with the originality of the idea, and decides to use it as her own essay. As she nears the end, Margaret's letter drops from between the pages. She reads it and is touched with remorse. She hurries back to Margaret's room, hoping to replace the papers without being discovered. This she accomplishes, but as she is closing the door, she hears Margaret stir; she has time to make her escape, but her better nature prevails and she returns. She confesses, and a reconciliation takes place. Margaret's essay wins the prize, and she receives it among the congratulations of her school-mates. Henriette, her former rival, is now her sincere friend and well-wisher. She takes the lead in showing attentions to Margaret's father and mother, who have come to witness their daughter's triumph.

A CHILD'S PRAYER (July 4).—The opening scene shows John Deveraux and his little motherless girl, at the grave of his dead wife. A similar scene is taking place miles away in the desert, where Burt King, his arm around his motherless boy's shoulders, kneels in silent prayer beside the fresh grave, crudely ornamented by a wooden cross, which contains all that is mortal of his wife. Sad at heart, each goes his way with a motherless child. The millionaire cattle king to his palatial home in Tucson; King to resume his weary passage across the desert in search of a homestead. A month passes. Deveraux has engaged a governess to attend to the education of his little girl and while shy at first, the child has gradually succumbed to the kindly advances of the governess and her sorrow for the lost mother is getting less and less. King has pre-empted a homestead near Tucson and made his permanent camp. Dick Morris, foreman of Deveraux's ranch, comes across King's camp one day and warns him that he is upon ground belonging to Deveraux. This King denies and refuses to vacate. Morris thereupon tells King he shall have three days within which to leave, and if he is still there at the end of that time, he will be thrown off. Morris then sends a note to Mr. Deveraux, telling of the situation and asking for instructions. Enraged at the squatter's presumption, Deveraux arms himself and starts in person to evict him. Stopping in his little daughter's room to bid her good-bye, he finds the child at the governess' knee repeating the Lord's Prayer. Much touched, he kisses his little one and departs. Arriving at the ranch, he leads his men to the squatter's camp. Just as they are about to enter the tent, he is stopped by the sound of a childish voice repeating the Lord's Prayer. His sympathies aroused by thoughts of his own motherless little one, Deveraux calls King outside the tent and presents him with the land he claimed.

JUST PRETENDING (July 5).—Little Albert Mills, eight years old, reads in the paper the accounts of the abduction of children and holding them for ransom. He conceives the idea of playing the game on his little sister, Henrietta. He writes a note reading, "I have your children. Put four thousand dollars under the stone on front porch and I will bring them back. They are now hanging by the hair. Blue Beard." He then tells Henrietta to look the other way, and he takes her dolls out of the doll buggy and hides them in the garden. Then he places the note in the rural delivery mail box at the front gate. A little later a young fellow brings an auto up to the gate and the children plead for a ride. After a little hesitancy he consents and the children are carried away to the park. Mrs. Mills misses the children and finds the note in the mail box. She takes the matter seriously, and gathering a lot of neighbors and a policeman, gives chase to the auto. Many accidents occur in the chase. Finally the kiddies are caught, the dollies are found, and it is due for little Albert to get a spanking, but mother pleads for mercy and the incident ends in a good laugh.

A PAIR OF BOOTS (July 5).—Two mischievous boys, finding the coachman's boots, decide to have some fun by placing them back of the portieres in Miss Annabelle's room, who is informed of the fact. Amid great excitement the constable, townsfolk, and in fact, everybody with enough courage to help capture the intruder, are asked to join in the posse. After several trying episodes the posse enter the room armed to the teeth, when they discover it is only a pair of boots.

THE BACK WINDOW (July 6).—Harry and May McCloskey, a young married couple, go on a visit to friends. The friends are the happy parents of a lovely baby, and while the visitors are in the house, they pet and fondle the baby until it becomes tiresome to the young people. When they get home they promise never to have anything like that. Three years later they are unhappy, but don't know it is the sound of children in the house that they want. The door between the rooms of the couple is closed. Out of their window they each become interested in the backyard adjoining. In the yard they see an Italian couple, the man is working with his flowers, and the wife is hanging clothes on the line. One day they miss the couple of the yard, and they are both much worried. For several days they watch the yard, and one day they see a colored mammy hang some tiny garments on the line. Harry and May (unknown to each other) decide to buy something for the baby of the Italians. Harry goes to a toy store and buys a rattle. May buys a baby dress. Harry gets home first and unwraps his package and lays it on the table and goes out of the house. His wife comes home, and unwraps her package and lays it on her table. She looks at her husband's door and slowly opens it. She is afraid he will come and surprise her, and locks the door leading into the hall. She sees the rattle on the table, takes it and holds it up and goes to the window. While she is standing there, Harry tries to come in, but finding his door locked, he goes through her room, sees the little dress on the table and picks it up and starts to his room. May meets him and holds the rattle behind her, he holding the dress behind him. They each hold them out to the other. They read a world of understanding in each other's eyes as he takes her to his arms.

EDISON.

THE CLOSE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION (July 2).—It is a strange coincidence that the beginning of the American struggle for Independence should begin with a famous ride and that the closing days of that heroic struggle should bring forth another ride that history has almost failed to recognize. No great poem has been written to make the name of Jack Jouett ring down through the ages as does that of Paul Revere. Nevertheless Jouett's ride should take its place amongst the great rides of the world for to him alone is due the lives of such men as Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry and Lee. Even the grave where this young hero lies is naked and unknown.

Charlottesville was the capital of Virginia for only one week after Richmond was named by the British, and the State Legislature was held by them in an old tavern, only a few miles from Monticello, Jefferson's home. This fact soon came to the attention of Cornwallis, who determined at once to strike a strong blow to the cause of the colonists by sending Colonel Tarlton and his daring men to dash on to Charlottesville and capture the State Legislature. It was a daring march, well planned and boldly carried out, and, but for the wonderful ride of Jack Jouett, it would have been crowned with success. Jack Jouett chances to be forty miles from Charlottesville. A moment and he plans to beat Colonel Tarlton and his horsemen on their aim of death and destruction. Mile after mile he urges his horse on by whip and spur until at last he reaches the door of the home of Thomas Jefferson. He calls forth the warning that the British are coming and is off to Charlottesville, where he bursts in upon the assembly. Again he announces the fact that the British are on their way, and he has finished his noble work. When Tarlton and his men reach Charlottesville a few moments later their prey have flown and they discover that they have had all their trouble for nothing. A short time later we are shown the surrender of the British at Yorktown, and the birth of the American nation.

PARTNERS FOR LIFE (July 3).—In a little two-room flat Molly and Tommy begin their married life after a brief moneymoon. Tommy has subconscious ideas as to the necessity of a man establishing his authority in the home, believing in mastership rather than partnership of husband and wife. Molly has her ieas, too, and makes every effort to assert her rights. At first the struggle for mastery is laughable and droll, but subsequently he begins a course of action that reduces Molly to misery. It goes so far that she decides to leave him and go back to earning her own living, but her friend, Ethel Mayhorn, who is a manicure lady and full of worldly wisdom, counsels otherwise. After all, as Ethel points out, the struggle for mastery, conscious or unconscious, is incidental to the beginning of all marriages. The thing to do is not to run away, but to fight for herself. So Molly, acting on her friend's advice, adopts a course of action that proves to Tommy, that he depends on her as much as she depends on him. Tommy, who had looked upon his wife's friend as a disturber, changes his views when he realizes that she is the guardian angel who brought peace and happiness to his household and made married life worth while after all. Instead of spending his evenings playing cards with his friends and englecting his wife, he now stays at home and lends every assistance in the performance of her household duties, and occasionally takes her to the theater and happily considers her as his partner.

THE WORKMAN'S LESSON (July 5).—Old Wenzel, who works in the machine shop of a big plant, like many other of the older workmen, is contemptuous of the "newfangled" safety devices which have been installed.

Wenzel lives in a nearby cottage with his daughter, Lischen. A young Italian, Bokko, who is out of work, passes the Wenzel cottage and stops to pluck a flower from the flower-bed. Lischen appears to protest and the two become acquainted. As a result Bokko comes again after Wenzel returns from work and the latter agrees to try to help him get a job in the machine shop.

Bokko, with Wenzel's help, secures the job and is put to work at a big lathe. He is interested in the safety device that covers the chuck, though old Wenzel snorts with contempt for it.

The acquaintance between Bokko and Lischen ripens to love. They become betrothed. Then, one day in the shop, Bokko, influenced by Wenzel's contempt, leaves the safety device open. There is an accident; his arm is badly mangled. Old Wenzel blames himself, realizing that he has led Bokko into carelessness.

While visiting Bokko at the company's hospital, the foreman sees old Wenzel coming on the same errand and quickly decides upon a plan to cure the old man of his contempt for precautionary measures. He quickly covers Bokko's injured arm with the bed clothing and, in answer to Wenzel's query, tells him that Bokko will lose his arm. The old man's grief is pathetic and he leaves, overcome.

Upon Bokko's discharge from the hospital he at once repairs to the home of his sweetheart and, while greeting her, old Wenzel sees the empty sleeve hanging at Bokko's side and breaks down. Bokko at last realizes what the trouble is and, throwing his coat back, discloses to his delighted sweetheart and her father his bandaged but now nearly normal arm. Old Wenzel has been taught his lesson.

HOW THE BOYS FOUGHT THE INDIANS (July 6).—Wild-eyed Bill, the terror of the prairies in a yellow back series, is the ideal hero of two boys, Johnny and Tommy Bell. Mr. Bell, having fallen heir to a ranch near the Indian reservation, decides to start for the West at once, much to the delight of Tommy and Johnny, who plot and plan for the event and persuade their father to present them with Indian suits and air rifles. This he gladly does, not knowing how deeply their minds are filled with Indian gore and Wild-Eyed Bill.

In due time they arrive at their destination and are installed in a country hotel near which is an Indian camp that is soon discovered by the two. They don their Indian suits, and taking their air rifles, sally forth to exterminate "The Red Skins." Upon reaching the camp they begin hostilities by peppering the Indians right and left with their air rifles. Instantly they are surrounded by the incensed Red Skins, but Blue Hawk, the chief's son, a graduate of the Indian school, finding the yellow back literature on the boys, sees the humor of the situation and dispatches a messenger to the boys' father informing him of the situation. The boys are now put through a course of sprouts and frightened to a frazzle, after which they are commanded to destroy "The Wild Bill" literature, and upon promise that they will never read such trash again they are returned to their father who in gratitude shakes hands with the Indians for teaching his boys a good lesson.

AN INTELLIGENT CAMERA (July 6).—The first thing a bride and groom in the rural districts does after the ceremony is performed and the opportunity presents itself, is to have their photographs taken.

Here we find Zeb and Cynthia going into a photograph gallery to engage the services of the artist. They are an exceedingly eccentric pair, both lacking all the elements that would make them attractive. In fact, they are just exactly the opposite and the moment the bride looks into the mirror to fix her hair it cracks into a dozen pieces. Her husband's attention is attracted by her to the catastrophe. Both are surprised and when their attention is attracted to the camera it runs around the room and finally exits precipitously. The photographer returns after a short absence, and to his dismay sees the damage that has been wrought by the couple's ugliness. He tries to run them out, but the bridegroom, being well supplied with money, readily offers to pay for the damage and all is well. The camera is again brought in, but refuses to stay —out it runs. The photographer brings it in again and nails it to the floor. This proves too much for the camera and it explodes. The enraged photographer insists on their leaving.

His assistant then announces another customer to the dismayed photographer. In comes a very attractive young woman whose beauty is such that when she looks into the mirror it is immediately made whole, the camera becomes whole again, and the photographer is happy once more.

BIOGRAPH.

A DASH THROUGH THE CLOUDS (June 24).—Arthur and Martha are sweethearts, but Martha becomes fascinated with the sport of aeroplane riding, and later is infatuated with the aviator. Arthur is a tutti-frutti salesman and goes to a neighboring Mexican town to sell his gum. Here he is a "cut-up" among the ladies. The Mexicans, incensed at Arthur's attentions to their sweethearts, attempt vengeance. Arthur sends a boy with a note to Martha that his life is in danger at the hands of the Mexicans. This is where Martha and her aeroplane driver shine, for with the aeroplane they dash to the rescue.

THE NEW BABY (June 24).—The nervous, expectant papa leaves for the office in a fever, for the stork is expected at his home. On the same day a new cook is engaged. She is a colored woman with a small baby, which she brings with her and ensconces in the kitchen. The gardner, hearing the cry of the picaninny, runs off to the nearest telephone and calls up the expectant papa, informing him that the baby has arrived. A few moments later the proud papa, rushing into the kitchen, followed by a crowd of friends he has collected en route, finds the cause of the excitement to be a little human "chocolate drop." His gloom, how-

THE SCHOOL TEACHER AND THE WAIF (June 27).—Little Nora is called the madcap of the village. She was not vicious, but merely mischievous, with her heart in the right place. Her madcap nature is not to be wondered at, as she was allowed to run wild, her mother being dead and her father a laborer. The school commissioners write to her father insisting that she be sent to school, and she would have been happy there if the scholars had not made her the butt of ridicule. This she strenuously resents and in her unhappy, lonesome condition, she listens to the flattery of a traveling street fakir, who would have succeeded in taking her away with him had not the school teacher, who saw in her a diamond in the rough, prevented it.

MAN'S LUST FOR GOLD (July 1).—Gold is the seed of avarice, theft, murder, and, in fact, most of the evil of the world. In our picture we show the father of a little family killed by a claim jumper who tries to take possession of his claim. Further on the claim jumper discovers the rich Skeleton Mine, guarded by a grim sentinel, the skeleton of its first victim. Bags of gold lay by and the claim jumper lugs two off. Out of water and fatigued, he buries the gold, intending to come back for it later. However, his strength fails him, and some distance on he falls exhausted. In this plight he is encountered by the son of the miner, whose claim he tried to jump and killed, but the boy's feelings towards him are now softened by his pitiful condition. Before the claim jumper dies he draws a map of the location of the gold. The boy and girl start out and they are made to realize the struggle gold induces.

ONE-ROUND O'BRIEN (July 4).—O'Brien and Duffy are up against it, and as "the eats" are coming at long intervals, they hit upon an idea that promises well. Interviewing a theater manager, O'Brien induces him to put up money, betting that he, O'Brien, will knock out "all comers" in one round. Did the plan succeed? Well, see.

TRYING TO FOOL UNCLE (July 4).—Dick's Uncle has always been too indulgent, and so Dick has been wild. Uncle, however, grows tired of Dick's recklessness and, giving him a roll of money, tells him to go and make a man of himself. Dick, thrown on his own resources, goes to another city, gets a job, and marries a poor girl. He proves capable of taking care of himself, but desiring to impress uncle he plans too big a scheme and nearly loses out.

TRAGEDY OF THE DESERT (July 1) (2-reel Special).—Dr. Franklin Cochran practices in Luxor, Egypt, and his vivacious wife, Miriam, is prominent in society affairs. She makes the acquaintance of Mahmud Bey, an Oriental diplomat, who becomes fascinated with the young woman and by artful blandishments so impresses the temperamental wife that she neglects her husband. In a burst of crazed anger the doctor departs for the desert, first making out a will which amply provides for Miriam. Reaching a Bedouin village Cochran trades his horse for a camel and continues across the desert. The scorching sun and sands almost overpower him, but with true instinct the camel finds an oasis, where the unfortunate wanderer falls in a daze.

Zenab, a young Egyptian woman, comes to the oasis and discovers the doctor. She summons her tribesmen, who tenderly carry Cochran to their village. When he gains strength the doctor embraces the Mohammedan faith, saying his past is dead and the future offers nothing. He is adopted by the Sheik, the father of Zenab.

The doctor labors faithfully with the natives and his friendship for Zenab develops into a warm love, which is reciprocated. The Sheik gives his daughter in marriage to Cochran and they live happily together.

There comes a time when Miriam, with a party of tourists, visits the quaint village, and there she discovers her husband. He is horrified at the meeting as he has long since consigned her to the forgotten past. Miriam, repentant, implores Cochran to return to her, but he is firm in his devotion to Zenab. The Egyptian wife sees her husband with the stranger and is lead to believe that she will be deserted.

Cochran accompanies Mirian to the edge of the village and then bids her to depart forever from his life. He returns to join Zenab and finds to his horror that the heartbroken girl has killed herself. The doctors cup of sorrow is now full and, kneeling at the side of his faithful wife, he cries in supplication: "Allah preserve us, for we are but the Dust of the Desert."

THE GIRL BANDIT'S HOODOO (July 1).—While Tom boasts of his bravery and marksmanship the stage coach arrives and excited passengers tell of a recent hold-up. Tom is inclined to laugh at the Sheriff for his negligence and declares that no one could hold him up. Nell and Bess, Tom's sisters, determine to teach the braggart a lesson.

A few days later when Tom starts for town in his auto, the girls unload his revolver and substitute blanks. They then hasten to disguise themselves as bandits and proceeding to the highway await the return of the boaster. It happens that Tom loans his machine to a friend, Bagley, and that worthy gentleman's identity being lost by ulster and goggles, the girls relieve him of his valuables, thinking him to be their brother. As Bagley rides out of sight he fires at the supposed bandits and a bullet pierces Nell's hat. This throws the girls into consternation as they cannot account for the efficiency of a revolver which they believe is loaded with blanks.

Their first surprise is mild compared to what greets them when they return home and hide their disguises. Tom arrives and incidentally displays watch and purse. The girls then inspect the captured valuables and find they belong to Bagley.

Fully repentant, the amateur bandits set forth that night to return Bagley's belongings. The unfortunate man has become apprehensive and engages the sheriff to protect his house. The girls are therefore captured by the vigilant official and the manner in which they clear themselves brings a laughable finale which is best told in the film.

THE FILIBUSTERS (July 3).—Don Daris, a newspaper reporter, fails to provide any "live copy" and is consequently in disfavor with his editor. Don goes to call on Daisy, the daughter of a tugboat captain, and the irascible father orders the young man from the wharf. Daisy tells Don that if he will hide on the "Ruth E" on the trip about to be made he will secure material for a big story.

In the meantime, Anita, a Spanish girl spy, determines to learn the destination of the tug. Through a hazardous subterfuge she discovers that the craft is carrying arms and ammunition for the Cuban insurrectos. This information she imparts to the Spaniards, who set out in pursuit of the tugboat. The Spaniards arrive on the scene while the boat is landing the contraband goods and Don and Daisy, through a clever ruse, succeed in blowing up their pursuers' boat. Don then returns with the tug to the place where the filibusters have made their landing. The captain and his crew come aboard and return in safety to Florida. The captain recognizes the clever resourcefulness of Don and finally accepts him as a suitor for Daisy's hand. The story that Don turns over to the editor brings him the enviable position of "Star Reporter."

WINNING A WIDOW (July 5).—While crossing the Atlantic, Jim White, an American tourist, is attracted by a charming young widow. He succeeds in making the lady's acquaintance through her four-year-old son and thereafter he becomes a persistent suitor and shadow. It happens that Luxor, Egypt, is the destination of both parties and when they arrive at that point Jim determines to win the widow without further delay. She does not encourage his suit and he becomes desperate.

Jim hits upon a subterfuge and engages an Egyptian to help him out. However, the best laid plans often miscarry, and when the widow learns of the plot she prepares one of her own. Jim meets with a decided surprise and the little son is the means of bringing about a mutual understanding.

THE PRINCESS OF LORRAINE (June 11).—Somewhere in the West of Europe, lying on a cozy stretch of fertile land, was a principality where love was king of everything and everything was fair. There was a princess, a bright, blithe, buoyant, vivacious miss, to whom life was a toy and the world a play-ground. The fires and forces of youth firmly emphasized the dominant spirit and the tender strength of her charming femininity. The courage and confidence of youthful years reinforced the happy contentment of her care-free nature. Yet—often when the twilight fell, hushing the din of the day, and a lone star glimmered in the Western sky, whispering with wondrous witchery of the day's decease, she would sit in pensive musing and gaze across more miles than the eye could see, seeming to listen to a vague voice within her—the soft, still call of slumbering love.

Across the mountains to the Westward, nestling in the lap of the foot-hills, drowsed a little municipality in peaceful but unproductive slumber. The ruling prince was a statesman. A long hereditary line of political marriage and mirage had subdued whatever poesy or romance he might otherwise have possessed. Moreover, he had the advertising instinct. He was not a visionary, but he had the foresight to realize that an alliance with the striving, thriving community across the mountains would result in good and gain for his own dominion. So he dispatched his heralds to advise King Theold that he was coming to sue for the hand of the princess.

The king was old. The years had written their weary record on the scroll of his soul. He desired the princess to wed before the grave sent its silent summons. He exorted her to marry the prince; but the wee whisper of that subtle power slumbering somewhere in her soul wakened and warned her to war.

She donned the peasant's garb, left the grim grandeur and the menacing mockery of the castle, and went out into the world. And there she met one whom ages ago Fate had coupled with her, one who kindled into flame the spark of love and longing that had flickered somewhere in her superconscious being, like a torch showing her soul its way through man's defiance and destruction of nature's prerogatives, to the haven that had been designed and assigned for it.

She did not know that he was the prince incognito, nor he that she was the princess—such is the mystery of fate's mastery. But it was given them to see and know and understand.

THE REASON (June 25).—They were a successful family—because they were happy. Their home was the greatest temple in the world, because it sheltered contentment. And then the child came. They loved each other so much, it seemed they couldn't spare enough for the little stranger, but they did—love multiplies itself. Then he met her, the pretty, dark-haired, dark-eyed, sweet-voiced Italian girl. She worked in his strawberry field, and he saw much of her. And something stirred and wakened in her and clamored in her heart for freedom—the imprisoned love that had smouldered in her being all the years of her youth. All the pulse and impulse of her race, all the fire and faith of a first love, all the timid tenderness and trust and truth of a woman-child molded and melded into a blind passion.

He took an interest in the girl, which she mistook for affection. He placed her in charge of the pickers; he was kind and gentle to her, and in her eagerness to do so, she recognized his kindness as love.

Later he began to feel the strange power overwhelming him, and gradually submitted to it. There was fascination in her, a luring challenge, a dominant seduction. Her lips were inviting in their freshness, her voice soft and sweet, her eyes contained forgetfulness—and he forgot. In those eyes were all the innocence and all the sin of the world; in their black mystery was conflict, the soul-struggle of all humanity on the battlefield of the world; yet—in their dark depths was peace.

His wife first doubted, then suspected, then realized the bitter truth. Almost at the same time the girl learned of his wife and child. But her love was too strong, too reckless, to be conquered by her knowledge of right and wrong, and her passion was only increased by the furious rage of the realization. Once she saw the child, with its sweet, little face and laughing blue eyes, and realized in it her most dangerous rival for the love of the man she loved. But—had he not told her that he loved her? Yes, and had he not asked her to go away? Ah, his wife, his child, were nothing. It was she! and their love—their love that was stronger than his soul.

Then Something took the matter in its own Mighty Hands. The child walked down to the sea one day, and in childish daring was about to step into the water. The girl saw, and felt a fiendish, inhuman delight at the promised destruction of the greatest obstacle in her path. Then God permitted her to see her error; she realized a human life was even greater than a great love, and she flew to the bank and rescued the child from the impending peril. Almost tenderly, she led it from the threatening danger, straight to the arms of the distracted parents anxiously searching for it. The father pressed the child to his heart, and in the vast joy of its safety, drew his wife to him and kissed her. Then the three walked off, forgetting the girl and her sacrifice, never thinking of the bitter cost of their happiness. But God whispered to the girl that she was right, and her heart sheltered a giant joy.

WHEN MONEY ISN'T MONEY (June 27).—Poor little Jimmie is the only son of a poverty-stricken family. His father has died and Jimmie is the sole support of three or four, who combine their efforts with him in selling and trading in rags. Fortune smiles upon him one sunny morning when he finds a pocketbook in which a huge amount of large bills are bulging. He hurries home with his find to mamma, who rummages through the money, much more than she had ever seen, and finds the card of its owner. Inasmuch as this humble family is blessed with the most scrupulous honesty, she takes her little Jimmie in hand, and, with one of his sisters, proceeds to the home of the rightful owner of the pocketbook. Jimmie delivers it in person and receives the reward in the form of a brand ned hundred-dollar bill. Pleased beyond description with this unexpected fortune, he proceeds at once to the clothier and picks out a most tasty suit. What is Jimmie's dismay, when the proprietor refuses to allow the suit of clothes to go out of the house unless Jimmie presents him a bill of smaller denominations, because he suspects that such a poorly clad little urchin could never come by so large a bill legally. Sorely disappointed, Jimmie proceeds to the nearest cafe to quench his thirst, but history repeats itself here, and he fails to obtain satisfaction because nobody will believe that he has not stolen the bill or that it is not counterfeit. He again meets with the severest kind of disappointment, this time by not being allowed to obtain a meal in a restaurant. There is only one thing that he can do. That is to get a bill of smaller denominations, whereupon he summons up his courage and goes back to the man who had paid him this sum as a reward and asks him to split up the hundred-dollar note into smaller change.

THE LION'S REVENGE (July 2).—Mrs. Ramsay, the wife of a wealthy explorer, has a private zoological collection on her premises. A special guard is employed to tender these captive animals the best of care. One day during her husband's absence, Mrs. Ramsay discovers this keeper abusing Spartacus, the huge savage Numidian lion, and discharged him on the spot. He, however, resented the action of his employer's wife and vowed to obtain revenge.

The opportunity arrives upon an afternoon when the explorer and his wife are entertaining their friends with a sumptuous ball at a hotel near their home. During their absence, the keeper enters their home on the pretense of wanting a cap accidentally forgotten, and sets the lions loose. The servants hear the roars of the liberated beasts and run to Mrs. Ramsay with the news. She hurries home in time to save her child, succeeds in driving the lionesses back into their enclosures, but cannot find the fierce Spartacus. Frenzied by his roaming at large, she searches till she does discover him in the parlor, where he had tracked the malignant keeper and wreaked revenge for his mistreatment. The big lion was quite peacefully persuaded to reenter his cage, now that his object had been accomplished.

MAJESTIC.

MEALS BY WEIGHT (June 23).—Business is bad with Herr Sauerkraut. He thinks of an advertising scheme that will make him wealthy and puts up a sign which tells his customers the glad news that they will only be charged for the actual amount of pounds they gain while eating. Weary Willie is attracted by the new method of paying for a dinner, and, with the aid of a large cobblestone hidden under his coat, finds that he can eat a good meal and be paid for the pleasure as well. He informs his many pals of the new restaurant and they visit a large pile of bricks before entering for their mid-day meal. Herr Sauerkraut becomes suspicious when he finds so many of his customers weighing less after they eat than they did before, and drops a dollar bill on the floor, just out of reach of a particularly fat looking guest. The sight of the money is too much for the fat man and when he reaches for it, enough bricks fall on the floor to build a small church, much to Herr Sauerkraut's surprise.

THE KNIGHT AND THE FRIAR (June 23).—Lady Alice, a fair maiden of the 15th century, is being serenaded by the brave knight Tristram, who sits upon his prancing steed beneath her window within the castle gates. The jolly Friar Tuck interrupts the lovers and calls the maiden's father, which causes the knight to ride for his life, as his family and the maiden's are deadly enemies. Swearing vengeance upon the friar, the knight sends him a message by a peasant girl, who is taking a basket of food to his cell. Later the friar is surprised by the knight in his cell, and is made to lend the knight his robe. Lady Alice enters and confesses her love of the knight, to the supposed friar, and is surprised when she learns that she has been talking to her lover disguised in the monk's gown. Friar Tuck is forced to unite the two sweethearts at the point of a sword, and thus is the feud between two noble families happily ended.

PAPA'S DOUBLE (June 25).—In a card game at the club, Jim Thomas has the misfortune to quarrel with his prospective father-in-law, who forbids Jim to ever enter his house again. Madge Jones, his fiance, meets him without her father's knowledge, but is found out and sent away to a boarding school, where Mr. Jones gives strict orders that Madge be allowed to see no one but her father. Jim learns of Madge's plight, and, disguising himself so that he looks like Mr. Jones, calls upon Madge and completely fools the boarding school mistress, who thinks he is Madge's father instead of her sweetheart. Jim, while disguised as Mr. Jones, takes one of the pretty inmates of the boarding school out for a walk and buys her a box of candy. Mrs. Jones happens along in her automobile and sees Jim with the boarding school miss. She thinks he is her husband and poor Mr. Jones has trouble waiting for him when he returns from business that evening. Mr. Jones calls at the boarding school and meets Jim, made up as his double, but Jim and Madge have managed to get married, and Mr. Jones is too busy straightening up the complications that his double has gotten into to object.

GETTING RICH QUICK (June 30).—Splivins and Gelvis, two live wires who live by their wits, find themselves without any funds. By borrowing all of the office boy's small change they advertise for a partner with ten thousand dollars to finance a mail-order business. Mr. Simp reads the advertisement and, much against his wife's wishes, becomes a member of the firm. The partners immediately become prosperous with their newly found capital, and in order to give Mr. Simp a good run for his money, launch a mail-order scheme which gives promise of being a dismal failure. Much to everyone's surprise the scheme turns out to be a wonderful success. Thousands of letters arrive at the office of Splivins and Gelvis, and it takes the combined efforts of the firm, stenographer, the office boy and all their sweethearts to open the mail. When a farmer arrives at the offices and insists upon leading his old gray mare into the inner office, a climax is reached, which is a real surprise.

THE FLAT UPSTAIRS (July 2).—The janitor of the Goldbrick Apartments complains to Mr. Slavin about the unearthly noises heard coming from his apartment every afternoon. Slavin is at a loss to know what causes the nuisance, but decides not to mention the subject to his giddy wife. He tells the janitor to call him up at his office as soon as the noises start. Mrs. Slavin has histronic aspirations, and is taking lessons in acting from Nicholas Hamfat. She is planning to give a private performance in order to convince her husband that she can act. Hamfat has trouble in finding an actor to fill a certain romantic part in her play and engages an "old clothes man" as a last resort. The rehearsal takes place in Mrs. Slavin's apartment, which accounts for the sounds of strife issuing therefrom. The "old clothes man," dressed as "Romeo," is placed in a closet to await his cue, when he is to rush into the room with drawn sword. The rehearsal is at its height when Mr. Slavin appears on the scene. Hamfat hides under the table and Romeo is in the closet, waiting for his cue. Slavin finds several suits of men's clothes, and has a stormy scene with his wife, during which he unwittingly gives "Romeo" his cue to burst from the closet. The resulting laughable scene is enjoyed by all the tenants of the apartment house.

THE BURGLAR ALARM MAT (July 2).—Burglars have been so active in the neighborhood of the McPhere home that Mrs. McPhere is on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Her husband has a burglar alarm mat installed in the house and assures her that she is now secure against burglars. The mat is placed in the hall near the front door, and an electric attachment connects it with a large bell placed over the head of McPhere's bed. McPhere returns home late from the club and forgets about the mat until he has stepped on it. He finds his wife hiding in a trunk, where she has taken refuge from the supposed burglar. Things run along smoothly for a while, when the bell suddenly peals out its deadly warning once more. The cause proves to be McPhere's daughter, standing on the mat, saying a long farewell to her sweetheart. Later the large house dog, Rover, causes another alarm by preparing for his customary nap, and finally Mr. Burglar himself appears, and stepping over the mat, helps himself to the McPhere silverware and in the end carries off the mat under his arm, while the McPheres are peacefully sleeping.

LOVE, WAR AND A BONNET (July 1).—It is wartime and little Sallie Batte, finding herself without a bonnet, and unable to purchase one, decides to trim one all herself. She consults her old Mammy, who suggests a visit to the attic, where the needed material may be found. To their delight an old hat with heaps of roses is discovered lying in an old trunk. These are seized by Sallie, who soon has a pretty bonnet fashioned from the relics of the past.

While busily engaged in her work the little girl is trying to decide to her satisfaction whether she really and truly is in love with Walter Barry, a young Confederate captain, who has long been devoted to the petted child, but the masterpiece is completed before she comes to a decision. Being called from the room she leaves her new bonnet on the table and in her absence there enters an unexpected visitor in the shape of a youthful Northern spy, who is seeking a disguise in order to safely reach his camp. Seeing the bonnet, seemingly awaiting an owner, it is the work of a moment to place it on his head, wrap a cape about him, and quietly make his exit from the house. He swiftly mounts his horse and races for his life.

When the loss is discovered, Sallie, in despair, makes inquiry of all and, upon being told by an old servant in which direction the strange man clothed in her garments, had gone, she immediately gives chase. She rapidly gains on the masquerader, and he as a last resort, drops the bonnet and cape in the road; these are found by the brave girl and hastily donned.

Meanwhile, an alarm has gone forth that a Yankee spy is in the country, and Captain Barry is appointed to effect his capture. After riding some miles, he sees in the distance a figure, whom he thinks is the man he is in search of, and spurring his horse rapidly gains upon him. Poor Sallie, for it is she, hearing the clatter of hoofs, thinks the spy is pursuing her, and dismounting, seeks a hiding place in a house she is passing. She has just concealed herself behind the sofa, when Captain Barry enters the room. Of course, she is discovered, and when dragged forth by the angry man, who is prepared to handle her roughly, she removes the wonderful bonnet, and to his astonishment and chagrin, there stands revealed the girl he loves. Realizing this is his opportunity, the Captain determines he will force the stubborn girl to admit that she loves him. She at first denies this strenuously, but finally he conquers and when they leave the house together, he has Sallie's promise to be his wife.

BETTY, THE COXSWAIN (July 4).—Young Ned Dean, the coxswain of the Barton University Rowing Crew, is in love with Betty Marshall, a pretty, athletic girl, who is a great favorite in the college town. Her father gives his consent to the marriage, provided Ned and his eight win the annual 'Varsity boat race.

Ralph Cummings, a classmate of Ned's, is heavily in debt to a bookmaker, who forces him to get Ned out of the way before the start of the great race in order that it may be won by the opposite side. He is anxious for the Barton University to lose, as he has gambled heavily against their crew. Ralph, therefore, sends a note to Ned a few minutes previous to the race, informing him that his mother has met with a serious accident and wants him. Ned rushes out to the place where the accident is said to have occurred, but instead of finding his mother, he is confronted with two men, one of whom strikes him a blow which knocks him senseless. When he regains consciousness his first thought is of the race, and soon he has succeeded in breaking the window, and is on his way back to join his crew.

In the meantime, both crew and coach are in despair, until Betty appears and begs to be allowed to steer for Ned. She disguises herself as a boy and takes her place in the coxswain's seat. Their crew is victorious and, when Ned arrives, he as well as the other boys, are surprised to find that their coxswain is Betty.

HOME AGAIN (July 6).—A convict makes his escape from prison, and upon being missed is immediately pursued by guards, who rapidly gain upon him. He, realizing this, and seeing a tramp bathing in a pond, quickly exchanges clothes without the hobo's consent, and continues on his way unmolested. The guards, discovering the poor tramp in the water, immediately jump to the conclusion that he is their man, at once open fire upon him. The poor man quickly emerges from the water, and, seeing only the convict's clothes, dons them and runs with the guards in pursuit.

In the meantime the convict has escaped detection, but seeing a detachment of guards coming down the road, he takes refuge in a hay wagon which is fully loaded, hoping by this means to make his escape good. The driver of the wagon mounts to his seat, and soon the town is left behind them. When the destination is finally reached and the convict cautiously peeps out, to his consternation he finds that he is in the jail yard, which he left only a few hours before. Now that escape is impossible, he enters the prison again and makes his way to the cell, where the guards find him calmly smoking a pipe when they make their rounds.

PRINTING AND ENGRAVING U. S. GOVERNMENT STAMPS (July 6).—The second of the two releases dealing with the work done at the Washington Bureau of Engraving, illustrates the making of the United States postage and commercial stamps. The printing, perforating, cutting and the other operations are shown. The various mechanical and typographical processes being well illustrated.

DOGGIE'S DEBUT (June 30).—The little boy's life was all happiness up to the time that he was nearly nine years old. He lived with his grandfather, who seemed to be rich and gave him all the pets that any child could ask for. So it was quite a shock to him when dear old grandpa died, and he found that all the money had flown away, for the old man had suffered unexpected reverses in Wall Street, which was really the cause of his death.

Perhaps the pangs of poverty might not have been so severe had it not been for the fact that the cruel creditors seized everything. Jack saw the expensive furniture disposed of without a pang, but when they began to dispose of his pets to the highest bidder, despite his protests, things began to look serious. Several of his loved ones had gone under the hammer before he decided what to do. Then he took his poodle, the only pet left, and fled from the accursed house.

It is pretty hard for a little boy to make his way in the world, and especially difficult if there is another mouth to feed, even if that other mouth is satisfied with dog biscuits. So it was not long before the youngster began to fear that he would be compelled to ask charity, to keep his little home together.

Luck came his way at last, for in a nearby town he saw posters advertising an Animal Congress. Convinced that his pet was bright, far more intelligent than any other dog, he decided to apply for an engagement, knowing that the poodle would gladly work to get bread for his kind, young master.

Much to his surprise, there was a distinct tendency at the theater to jeer at him, but his troubles ended when the animal trainer appeared. For in the days of carefree wealth, the trainer had been the groom at the boy's home and they had been great friends. The groom was mighty fond of the child, and only too glad to do him a favor in the time of his need.

The youngster joined the former groom, and became assistant trainer. His friend and partner never regretted his kindness, for as he often said, "the act is 50 per cent. better now that I have 'Little Pal' with me."

OUT OF THE DARK (July 2).—A young lawyer receives word from abroad that a package of jewels, valued at $20,000, which has figured in a law suit, has been shipped to him from Europe, to be held for a client. He meets the steamer, receives the valuables and starts with them to a bank, meaning to place them in the vaults. He has forgotten that it is Saturday, and a half holiday, and the result is that he discovers that he must keep the custody of the gems over Sunday. This does not worry him, for he has a safe in his own home, and he does not dream that any one knows of the treasure in his possession.

The fact is, however, that the messenger has been trailed from Europe by a celebrated crook, who vainly seeks a chance to annex the valuables. He witnesses the transfer, and follows the lawyer, and is pleased to note that he takes the jewels home with him.

Late that evening the lawyer receives a telephone message that his father, who lives many miles away, is seriously ill, and hurries off to see him. Until he reaches the house he does not realize that he has been tricked, and then he hastens home again, full of gloomy forebodings.

In the meantime the lawyer's wife, who has gone to bed, suddenly awakens with a start. She imagines that someone is trying to get into the house, and, fearful for the security of the jewels, slips downstairs to investigate.

The lower hallway is in darkness, except for a dim light from the street. The doors have glass panels, and as the woman watches, one of them falls inward, and a hand appears and feels cautiously for the knob.

It is a lonely neighborhood, and the woman does not dare to call for help, her one impulse being to hide the jewels. She rushes into the room, hurriedly opens the safe, takes the packet and hides it in a crevice at the top of the mantel piece. As she turns to flee the burglar enters. There is a struggle and a scream, which fortunately brings help. The criminal is captured, but the shock has driven the woman mad. She remembers nothing; can tell nothing. It is clear to the police that the burglar has been successful, for there is the open safe and the jewels have vanished. Undoubtedly his pal escaped with the booty, they figure.

The lawyer finds that he is held responsible for the loss of the gems, which cripples him financially. Besides he has no hope that his wife will ever regain her senses. Yet in the hour of his deepest despair, happiness re-enters his life.

While looking over some papers in his safe one night he is called to the 'phone. His maniac wife watches him curiously, and a troubled frown comes over her face. Her perplexity deepens as he goes out, and she starts upstairs to bed. Some recollection is trying to find expression.

Again she awakens with a start. Again she steals down stairs, and gazes with terror as the pane of glass is broken, and a hand is stealthily stretched through the opening. She remembers the jewels, and thinks that they must be protected. Gliding into the library, she opens the safe, takes out a package of papers and hides them where the other bundle is. Then as the lights are turned on, she falls fainting into her husband's arms, her mind and his honor restored.

"It was the hand of Providence that caused me to forget my keys," the husband said later, "I had to break in the door, and the sight of my hand as shown in the moonlight, was what restored memory to my wife."

MA AND DAD (July 5).—First, there was the manicure girl. Anyone who saw her polishing away in the Grand Scrumptuous Hotel knew in a minute that she ate only at cabaret restaurants, and had bushel baskets of diamonds.

The fact was that the moment her day's toil was over, she hustled out to Bronxville, where her mother had a tiny little chicken farm, and the two lived there very happily together.

Second, there was the boy. He was the regular Rah Rah type, and persons frequently pointed him out as a gridiron star, or a celebrated pitcher, when the fact was that the longest time he had ever been in college was two weeks.

Third, there was "dad," father of the boy. Dad had "oodles" of money, and a sad face, whereat everyone talked of his blue blood, and how an ancestor came over on the Mayflower. The facts were that "dad" himself came over on the Cunard Line steerage, but he knew how to make money and save it.

Fourthly, there was "ma," who lived in the country, and no one ever suspected for a minutes that she was the mother of a manicure girl. The girl polished the boy's nails, and he told her that she had won his heart. He proposed, she accepted, but the boy was afraid to tell dad, fearing he might object. So the young couple ran away, and sent dad a note, which conveyed among other information the statement that the girl's mother was a "Countess," which was a lie. Dad didn't object to the marriage; in fact, he didn't give a hoot about the title in the family, but he was glad his son had settled down. Besides the girl seemed all right, and he grew quite fond of her.

While the young couple were on their wedding trip, Dad went out on a rural tour in his auto. As he traveled along, a chicken tried to demonstrate the old question, "Why does a chicken cross the road?" In this particular case the answer was "to get killed." Dad was very sorry, of course, and offered the owner, an elderly woman, money to pay for it. She refused at first, but finally accepted, on condition that he take the victim with him. There were more or less arguments and finally the woman agreed to cook the chicken for him.

The chicken tasted pretty good to dad, and he felt more at home every minute. Then the postman arrived with a card from the woman's daughter, who was on her honeymoon down South. Proudly she showed it to her visitor, and he recognized the pictures of his son and the son's bride. Also he realized that the comfortable old countrywoman before him was the much maligned "countess."

He was mighty glad she was not a countess, for if she had been, she never could have cooked chicken so divinely, he reasoned. Dad decided that it was about time that he had settled down, too. There was a rapid fire courtship, and when the young people returned they found that ma was no longer a "countess," but something far more important.

She was boss, for she and dad were married.

RELIANCE.

VOTES FOR WOMEN (June 26).—The suffrage workers are vainly endeavoring to win over Senator Herman to their cause as his vote on a certain bill they favor means its passage. May Fillmore, one of the most ardent of the workers, discovers that the father of a little motherless tenement brood has died of tuberculosis, after having vainly importuned the owner, Senator Herman, to make building alterations that will remedy unsatisfactory conditions. She goes to the Senator's fiancee, Jane Wadsworth, and succeeds in securing her help. Jane accompanies May to the poor bereaved family, and she is shocked at the terrible lack of sanitation. They find three little girls and a baby left to fight the world alone. Elsie, the eldest, is doing embroidery sweat-shop work at home, and minding the baby, while Hester works in a department store. The other tot is a half-time scholar, and in the afternoons assists her sister working on corset covers for another shop. All these fearful conditions are pointed out by May and have their desired effect upon Jane. She is further shocked upon learning that her fiance is the negligent owner. Jane goes to him and pleads that he do something in the matter. He waves her away and treats her like a child. Angered, she joins the suffragists and assists in bringing both her father and the Senator to terms. Hester is insulted by a floorwalker in her father's shop, which proves another shock to Jane, when her father does nothing in the matter. Later she is stricken with scarlet fever, which she contracted from the embroidery on one of her trousseau gowns, which came from her father's store. The father and Senator, upon learning that they were in part guilty, as the embroidery was made in the Senator's unsanitary tenement, gives in and most enthusiastically joins the suffrage movement. They are seen with the girls at suffrage headquarters, at the Men's League, and finally in the parade.

BEFORE THE WHITE MAN CAME (June 29).—This story deals with the lives of the Indians who ruled primeval North America for centuries before the white man came. Meene-o-Wa, the fairest maiden of all the tribes of the Utes, was called "The Yellow Rose," bacause of her beauty. Wathuma, the leopard, loved her, but her heart was not given to him. One day in the forest she came upon a handsome young stranger. They looked into each other's eyes and Meene-O-Wa knew that she loved him. Leaving him there she ran away, but he followed her back to her father's camp. He went to the old chief and asked her hand in marriage. But the chief, looking upon his headdress of a single feather, told him that the man who won his daughter must be a chief. Then, considering, he told the stranger that if he could vanquish the famous warrior, Wahtuma, in a wrestling match, he might claim as his reward, "The Yellow Rose." Wahtuma, full of hate for his rival, put forth his best effort in the fight that followed, while Meene-O-Wa stood by, her heart torn with the fear that Waheta, the stranger, might lose. But the straight and supple stranger soon had the masterhand, and slowly forced his foe to his knees, amid the plaudits of the tribe. So Meene-O-Wa was given to Waheta, and Wahtuma left them, vowing vengeance. A few days later Meene-O-Wa, while waiting in the woods for her husband, is thrown from the rocks by Wahtuma. And there it is that her husband finds her, dead. The bereaved husband carried his wife's body back to the camp, and, after handing her to the old chief, he begs one boon of the great spirit that he be able to kill Wahtuma. Rushing out into the woods, he comes upon the leopard, and he gives him just one chance to defend himself. Before the fury of the maddened husband the other man's weapons are powerless, and he is overcome and killed. Waheta then returns to the camp to mourn over Meene-O-Wa's body.

NESTOR.

THE DAWN OF NETTA (June 24).—Will Barton has gone to the mountains in search of health. He learns from the doctor that he is dying and is distracted at the thought of leaving his beloved daughter, Netta, a girl of seventeen, alone and unprotected in the world. He telegraphs to Jack Gordon, his best friend, and upon his arrival, Barton asks him to marry Netta. Jack is a popular man and hesitates between his present method of living and his desire to gratify the dying wish of a man who has been his benefactor. Gratitude and pity conquer and he acquiesces. Barton places the hand of Netta in Jack's.

Later, Jack sends Netta to a school in Paris, and as time passes, he gradually ceases to think of his promise to Barton and his engagement to Netta, and becomes attached to Mrs. Smith Douglas, an attractive widow. The time for Netta's return arrives and Jack pursuades Mrs. Douglas to take care of Netta for a few days in order that he may have time to provide suitably for her. Jack neglects to tell Mrs. Douglas that he is engaged to Netta.

Netta arrives, and, instead of the forlorn little maid in black that Jack had parted with, he sees a developed and beautiful woman and falls madly in love with her. Seeing how popular Netta is with the young men who pay her great attention, Jack has a mental struggle between his love and a desire to be unselfish. He finally decides to give Netta her freedom that she may marry a man of her own choosing and nearer her own age. He does this gently, not knowing that Netta is genuinely in love with him, and always has been. She is heartbroken, but consents, thinking that Jack does not love her.

Netta seeks a secluded spot in a window seat and finds refuge in tears. Mrs. Douglas, who has grown fond of the girl and who is at heart a kindly woman, finds Netta, comforts her, and extracts her secret. She seeks out Jack and takes him to Netta, where they renew their troth in the soft light of the moon, whilst Mrs. Douglas, seeing their undoubted affection, draws the curtain gently that they may be alone.

REAPING THE WHIRLWIND (June 26).—Tom Ainslee has a charming wife and a dear little baby. Still he is a discontented husband, only too ready to see as much as possible of Nina Harrington, the flirtatious wife of kind-hearted, good-natured Jim Harrington, who had but recently arrived in the West and rented a cozy shack near the Ainslees. Of course, the inevitable happens; Martha Aaislee comes into a room unexpectedly and discovers her husband embracing his neighbor's wife. As soon as the woman goes, Martha pleads with her husband, but to no avail, for no sooner is his wife's back turned, than he follows Nina and again tells her of his love. Martha, when she discovers his absence, takes the baby and follows him. This time she pleads with Nina, who merely laughs at her misrey and turns gayly away.

The next day, as soon as Tom leaves the house to meet Nina, which fact Martha has learned from a note which she had deftly extracted from her husband's pocket, Martha takes her rifle and follows Tom. From the other side, Jim, who had the day before witnessed Martha pleading with his wife, carefully loads his revolver and keeps Nina in sight. Martha is taking careful aim when Jim comes upon them with his revolver. Quickly Nina springs before Tom, pleading with her husband not to shoot. Tom endeavors to run and it was this which decides Jim—the other man is not worth shooting; so commanding them to go, the outraged husband returns to pack his belongings and leave forever. No sooner is Nina's husband out of sight, than Nina upbraids Tom for running. Tom, feeling assured of Martha, frankly tells Nina that she means nothing to him and returns home to find, instead of the patient Martha, this note pinned to the door: "Tom—It is all over between us. I have taken the baby and gone, forever. Martha."

YOUNG WILD WEST LEADING A RAID (June 28).—Young Wild West arrives in the town of Big Echo with his party and makes an enemy of the Mayor of the town, because he will not buy drinks for the crowd. The Mayor and Wild West fight and Wild West shoots the gun from the Mayor's hand to teach him a lesson. A short while after, Wild saves his cook, a Chinaman, from the clutches of the sheriff, who had arrested him in mistake for a thieving Chinaman. This action of Will's incurs the enmity of the Sheriff. The Mayor and Sheriff, with two accomplices, have been robbing the town and been letting their positions shield them. They had planned to rob the Golden Giant mine on the day that Wild West and his party arrived in the town. The Chinese cook overhears the plot in the saloon and hurries back to the camp to tell Wild West. They decide to lay low and capture them later.

Meanwhile, the robbers, headed by the Mayor and the Sheriff, make their way to the mine and, with the help of the night watchman, who belongs to their gang, they carry the gold away and hide it in an old shack in the canyon below.

The next morning the news spreads that the mine has been robbed and the superintendent of the mine, hearing that Wild West is in town, sends for him. The Mayor and Sheriff arrive at his office at the same time that Wild West puts in his appearance. The superintendent gives them what information he can and tells them he will take them to the scene of the robbery. The Sheriff and Mayor object to Wild West going, but the superintendent's suspicions have been aroused and their objections are useless. They arrive at the scene of the robbery and question the night watchman, who breaks down and confesses all. In the meantime, the Sheriff and Mayor have sneaked off and are making their way to the shack. Wild and two of his men, with the superintendent and his sweetheart, follow them and Wild, climbing to the top of a high cliff, sees Jack in the distance and knows he is on the right track. He and one of his men go to the canyon, while one man goes to town for help, leaving the superintendent and his sweetheart behind. The Mayor and Sheriff, who have been hiding close by, hold up the remaining two. Outside, the posse joins Wild and he leads them toward the shack. The men inside realize their safety lays in flight, but after a few short chases, the four are captured. Wild returns the gold to the superintendent and receives his thanks.

BISON.

HIS MESSAGE (June 25).—Holmes and his daughter, Nell, live in a cabin, while he works his claim. Haven, a young prospector, has pitched his tent in the vicinity and the three become friends. Haven is fortunate in his quest for gold, and the pile of yellow metal accumulates until he has a goodly fortune in his possession.

The mining operations have been secretly watched by a trio of desperadoes, who await a favorable opportunity to steal it. One day Haven is severely wounded by a landslide, and his cries bring Holmes and Nell to his assistance. The girl nurses him at her home and completely wins his heart.

A week passes and Haven is about on crutches. Holmes goes to the settlement for supplies and the thieves seize this opportunity to carry out their scheme. As they are forcing an entrance, Nell escapes through a back window and makes a desperate ride to the settlement for help.

With the gold, Haven, by means of a table and a chair, reaches the attic. He then knocks a hole in the roof, and crippled as he is, slides to the ground. The thieves pursue him and mortally wound him. He continues his flight to the edge of the river where he falls dying on a rock, throwing the gold into the water. The thieves come up and not finding the gold turn back. Haven, feeling himself passing away, laboriously writes a message on the rock with his own blood: "The gold is in the water."

Accompanied by a score of men from the settlement, Nell is hurrying back at break-neck speed. The thieves are captured and Haven's body is found, and the gold recovered.

THE COLONEL'S PERIL (June 29).—Tom Norman, the son of the colonel, falls in love with pretty Nell, the daughter of a corporal. The colonel frowns upon the match and sends his son to college. Six months completely tire Tom of college life and he enlists in the army. The colonel is hurt over Tom's conduct and refuses to communicate with him.

Two years later, Tom, who has won his sergeant's stripes, is assigned to his father's post. The colonel refuses to recognize him as his son. Nell and her father, however, welcome him back.

A sudden uprising of the Indians sends the emigrants and settlers scampering for safety. Blazing cabins dot the surrounding country. At the head of a squadron of cavalry Colonel Norman sallies forth, confident in the belief that short work would be made of the redskins. He is surprised and ambushed, however, by a horde of redskins who outnumber the soldiers ten to one, and is himself shot from his horse. Tom picks up the unconscious body of his father, and carries it away, pursued by the relentless foe. Down a precipitous cliff Tom slides with his burden, and concealing his father behind a huge rock, makes every shot count.

A score of wounded and frenzied soldiers escape and gallop back to the fort. The sad story is quickly told and the second division is called out, riding like the wind to save their comrades. The Indians are routed and Tom and his father rescued from their perilous situation. The next day, propped up in bed, the colonel is visited by Tom and Nell, and he smiles his forgiveness as he tenderly draws them to him.

AMBROSIO.

THE ACTOR'S TEST (June 28).—Brown watches a picture on the screen of a theater and decides that acting is easy work. He applies for a position at a studio and his ability is tested in various strenuous ways. He is thrown through a window, ducked into a pond, compelled to ride a horse which throws him, etc. At the end of the day, swathed in bandages and walking on crutches, he goes to the office to receive his pay and is handed the "munificent" sum of two dollars.

BENARES, THE SACRED CITY (June 28).—This subject shows Benares, the Sacred City on the Ganges River, India, with its thousands of bathers, the quaint structures centuries old, etc. It is a beautiful scenic picture.

ITALA.

THE GREAT BANK FAILURE (June 29).—Helen Gordon is the adored daughter of a banker, and is engaged to a Captain Blake. She is gifted with a wonderful soprano voice, and at a reception at her home Garrett, a music composer, falls desperately in love with her, but conceals his affection.

The cashier of the bank absconds with the bank's funds, and in the crash that follows, the Gordons are deserted by their friends. Even Captain Blake turns from the prospect of marrying a penniless girl, and father and daughter are dropped from affluence to lonesome poverty.

Helen utilizes her musical education to earn a living for herself and her father. Garrett, who has remained loyal to the girl, has been perplexed to find a way in which he could assist her without wounding her pride, and, having written an opera which is being produced he persuades the theatrical manager to offer Helen the leading role.

A creditor of Gordon's has harassed the broken old man and threatens to bring criminal proceedings against him. Helen knows that he would never consent to have her appear on the stage so she assumes a stage name. She secures an advance sufficient to take up her father's notes, removing the specter which has been hovering over their humble home, but fearing to tell her father of her action.

The first performance is given, and Helen makes her triumphant debut. An immense theater is shown, with the audience wildly applauding Helen, who is supported by a large company on the stage.

Radiant with her success, Helen goes to her dressing room and is visited by the manager, who forces his attentions upon her. As she is struggling in his embrace Garrett enters and hurls him aside, and orders him away.

In revenge the manager writes an anonymous letter to Gordon, telling him to come to the Lyric

Theater if he wishes to see his daughter on the stage. The next evening Gordon is among the audience, and when Helen appears he leaps upon the stage. Helen retreats to her dressing room, followed by her angry father. Garrett tries to pacify him, and at length makes him understand that Helen has done it all for her father. Ashamed, the old man drops on his knees and asks Helen's forgiveness, which she freely gives, and Garrett takes advantage of the moment to ask for Helen's hand.

POWERS

THE COMING GENERATION (July 3).—Madge and Willie are children of parents who shine in society circles, and are quite precocious. Their parents give a recherche dinner to which their select friends are invited. The children are taken by their nurse to dine in their playroom, and are given a cereal to start—a very frugal meal. Madge resents the slight and steals down stairs and gets a glimpse of the dining table, fairly groaning under its weight of delicacies. Returning to the nursery, the children talk it over and decide to go out and dine at a restaurant. They have no well defined plan, but resolve to submit to chance. To think is to act and, while Madge arrays herself in her mother's finery, Willie goes stealthily downstairs and appropriates a costume from the hallrack. Thus arrayed they go out unnoticed and hail a taxicab, give directions to the driver through the tube, and are whirled away to a swell cafe. Their entry causes some surprise, but the obsequious waiters are all attention and the children order liberally.

In the meantime, the nurse and butler have abstracted a bottle of wine and some pastry, and are having a surreptitious feast. The children are missed, and a search is instituted. A trip through the house reveals the disorder in the room of the mother and there is general consternation. That the children have been kidnapped by the robbers there is no doubt, and an officer is summoned. When the waiter presents his check, Madge gives him one of her mother's visiting cards and the waiter telephones to the house. The agonized parents and their guests rush to the cafe, accompanied by the officers and find the missing children just finishing their dinner. The mystery is explained—a happy culmination to the pranks of the children.

COMET.

THE TALE OF A RUBBER BOOT (June 22).—Walker Tracks was a particularly lucky and fortunate man. In the first place his digestion was good. In the next instance, a cheerful, happy-go-lucky disposition made him equally at home in poverty, or the midst of plenty. Therefore, Walker never allowed anything to ruffle or disturb his equilibrium. Still, Walker had one great fault—he was lazy. Laziness is most reprehensible, and is likely to result in one's undoing, but with Walker it seemed only a stimulus, for being too lazy to work, Walker must needs seek sustenance through other channels. He, therefore, elected to walk, and trust to the Creator of all things to feed him. So Walker straightway became a tramp.

Like the migratory denizens of the air, the North was his habitat in summer, and the balmy breezes of the south found him basking under the Magnolia, lulled to sleep by the call of the mocking bird and the hiss of the alligator. It was during a temporary sojourn in the southern environment that Walker experienced his first big stroke of good fortune.

It so happened that a simple and inoffensive elderly land owner, who had married in his later years, a shrewish woman, with a grown up lout of a son, was prevailed upon by them to sell a valuable orange grove, hoping to get possession of the money. The property was duly advertised, and a purchaser quickly found. The money was paid in due course, and in an effort to conceal it, until an opportunity offered to deposit it in a bank, he placed it in the toe of an old rubber boot, for safety and temporary concealment. Walker Tracks, by chance, happened into the vicinity during his peregrinations and, stopping at the pump, is in the act of helping himself to a drink of water, in lieu of something more potent. The shrewish wife spies him, drives him away with a broom, but the kind-hearted husband intervenes, stops the onslaught, and taking Walker to the house, he gives him food, drink, and a little change, bids him God speed.

During the latter scene, the wife in her anger, has gone into the house. She discovers the old boots, where they had been carelessly thrown by the simple old man, and in disgust, carries them to the barn, and throws them in. Now Walker Tracks had sought temporary shelter in that same barn, and the brutal stepson of the old farmer finds him there, and throws him out, hurling various articles after him as he takes flight.

As a final salute, the boots are thrown after the retreating form of Walker. Seeing they are an improvement on his well-worn shoes, he concludes to make an exchange. While drawing them on, he discovers the money. Not knowing to whom it belongs, he appropriates it, and one long and glorious time follows amid the white lights of the Metropolis.

During one of his expeditions in search of pleasure and entertainment, he falls in with an adventuress and her confederate, who shortly relieve him of the remains of his ill-gotten gains, and he once more takes to the road. The lesson has been a salutary one, for he reforms, becomes a useful citizen, acquires a fortune, and becomes the proprietor of an extensive turpentine industry.

While visiting one of his groves, chance brings the simple old orange grower into contact with Walker, who recognizes him as the man who befriended him, and seeing his forlorn condition, inquires the reason. He is told how he was driven from his home by the brutal stepson after the loss of the money, and has been a wanderer ever since. Walker at once restores him the full amount of the money lost with interest, and assures him of his lasting friendship.

A REALISTIC REHEARSAL (June 24).—In the beginning of his historic career, Hughy Ford imagined himself a tragedian, and affected the deepest and most sonorous tones of voice, the most dignified and all-important strut, and the extreme of gesture. He hailed from Kansas, where his youthful days were passed midst rural surroundings. Farm life not being to his liking, he left his home at an early age, and sought the city, where, after a varied and uncertain existence, he drifted into the theater. Being of a resourceful disposition, he was not long in establishing himself.

His first efforts were confined in the smaller towns in the far West, but hearing of the success attained by others of his ilk, in that great theatric mart, Broadway, he assembled his meager belongings, and with his wife, sought the great "White Way." Being a type, he found no difficulty in securing an engagement. Returning from the agent to his sparsely furnished room, he is anxiously greeted by his patient little wife, who inquires of his success. He shows the part and a contract for the season at a liberal salary.

As he is called for rehearsal on the following morning, he concludes to "run over" the lines, and familiarize himself with the various situations, so he asks Mrs. Ford to hold the part, and prompt him when necessary. As the plot develops, Hughy becomes greatly interested and, in his abstraction, loses himself completely. Seizing his wife by the throat in one of the most tense and trying situations, he drags her about the room, giving vehement expression to his lines, while she shrieks with terror. The neighbors are alarmed, believing murder is being committed, so the police are summoned. Just prior to their arrival, Hughy has reached a particularly strenuous situation, and hurling his wife from him with great force, she staggers back, and overturns an oil stove with which she came in contact. The curtains ignite, and an alarm is sent in, which results in the arrival of several fire engines upon the scene. An enormous crowd assembles, and great excitement and confusion ensues, when the police and fire department enter the room, which is now a scene of great disorder. Explanations are made, the crowd dispersed, and poor Hughy and his faithful and loving wife, are left alone to brave the wrath of an unsympathetic landlady.

REPUBLIC.

EVIL BE TO HIM WHO EVIL THINKS (July 2).—Hiram Perkins, a young farmer, has married a beautiful country girl, and, after the novelty of the honeymoon had worn off, he became blind to his wife's charms and made of her a farm drudge. His main object in life was money, and to increase his income, he decided to take in summer boarders.

Dick Ravenwood and his mother were the first to come there and Dick, becoming charmed with Mrs. Perkins' personality, did everything in his power to lighten her burdens. Perkins' mind, too cramped for any broad thought, misunderstood these innocent attentions and did not hesitate to unjustly accuse his wife of unfaithfulness. Mrs. Perkins bore all this with the spirit of a martyr, and was greatly relieved when upon her younger sister's arrival, Dick concentrated all his attentions upon her.

Dick's impetuous nature knew no obstacles and he quickly won the heart of Mrs. Perkins' younger sister, Nellie. Nellie would not name the happy day until Dick had spoken to her sister, so Dick sends a note asking Mrs. Perkins to meet him in a secluded spot (where Nellie is in hiding), as he has something of great importance to tell her. This note falls into the hands of Perkins, whose brain becomes fired with jealousy and whose evil mind can see nothing but wrong in every action.

Perkins bides his time and upon seeing Dick alone in a canoe fires at him, causing Dick to fall into the water helpless. Mrs. Perkins hears the shot, and, looking toward the lake, sees Dick slowly sinking. Without a moment's hesitation she leaps into the river and rescues him. Perkins is finally made to realize his mistake, and also to appreciate his wife whose drudging days are about over at the time when Dick marries her sister.

THE GIRL IN THE AUTO (July 6).—An international marriage, the desire of a fond and title-loving mother, which would have turned into a tragedy, is averted by Willie's love of a pretty face, a glimpse of which he had caught during an auto trip. Willie's desire to become acquainted with the owner, leads him into many strange places. During a visit to the Immigration Office, he becomes interested in the case of the Italian woman, who is seeking her husband, of whom she has a photograph which she shows Willie in her appeal for assistance.

Willie, after leaving the Immigration Office, decides upon a trip to the seashore, and a dip in the ocean. To his surprise and pleasure he meets the young lady whose face has haunted him for many days. Willie and the young lady mutually attracted, soon become very fast friends, and Willie plans to visit the young woman at her home. He meets the title-loving mamma, who does not hesitate to discourage Will's attentions to her daughter, which was not at all pleasing to the daughter.

The Count is introduced to Will during an evening on the piazza, and Will is immediately struck with the remarkable resemblance of the Count with the photo that he saw at the Immigrant Office in the hands of the deserted wife. Will communicates with the authorities who bring the wife to the seashore and, in the presence of the title-worshiping mamma, he proves the Count to be an imposter, as well as the husband of the Italian peasant. Needless to say that both the daughter and Will were very pleased at the outcome.

LUX.

THOU ART THE MAN (June 28).—A foolish son fondly imagines that he can do without his parents' help, so goes forth into the world after breaking their hearts and disgracing himself generally. Shortly afterwards he writes to his mother and tells her that he is in trouble and greatly in need of money. His fond mother is much distressed, as she is unable to persuade his father to let him have any money, and all is sadness in their little household. That night, footsore and weary, the prodigal son returns home. His father relents, his son takes his supper and retires to rest. His father is a gamekeeper, and therefore goes forth to his duties directly after supper, leaving his wife reading a newspaper. Presently a tramp comes to the cottage and asks for something to eat. He is invited in, food is laid before him. As the tramp eats the woman reads of a murder that has been perpetrated in an adjacent town. A photograph of one of the supposed murderers is given and the woman imagines that she recognizes the original of the photograph in the tramp. As a reward is offered for his capture the woman realizes that, if she can inform the police, she will get the money that her son needs. She therefore sends her daughter to fetch the police, and in the meantime, plies her visitor with wine. Her son too uneasy to sleep, comes down from his room. He enters just as the police burst in and are about to seize the tramp. The good woman is surprised to see the tramp snatch off his wig and false beard, point to her son and instruct the police to arrest him. Thus, in endeavoring to obtain the offered reward, the woman brings the real culprit to justice—her own son.

BY THE CLIFFS OF ETRETAT (June 28).—A splendid little scenic film, depicting the picturesque cliffs of Etretat, a well-known little town in France.

FATHER AND THE BOYS (July 3).—A wealthy and gay old widower, with two sons, secretly plans to marry his stenographer. His oldest son and partner in business returns from a trip, meets and falls in love with his prospective step-mother, and father's chances go glimmering. Later, the youngest son returns from college unexpectedly, and he carries off the prize—putting one over on both father and brother.

Polly Prim, the pretty stenographer, who stirs up so much excitement in the household of "Father and the Boys," holds on to her job by keeping her boss on the string. She plays one man against the other until they are fairly desperate. Little Bobby, the office boy, is wise to her machinations, and has considerable fun out of it. He puts Bridget, the cook, wise to it all, and they both help to complicate matters.

When Billy comes on the scene and carries off the beautiful shorthand artist, father and brother throw seven different kinds of fits of consternation—and the biggest joke of it all is that "father" is compelled to pay Billy's honeymoon bills.

BETWEEN TWO FIRES (July 5).—Clarissa Howland, a young married woman, has written foolish letters to Henry Harrison, a blackguard, who later forces money from her on his threat that he will send the letters to her husband. In an interview in which, failing to produce a thousand dollars he demands, she is forced to promise to give him a valuable emerald necklace. She agrees to leave the library window open so he may quietly enter that evening and receive the necklace in exchange for the letters. This interview is overheard by Bill Burk, a burglar, who follows Clarissa home.

That evening Clarissa opens the window and leaves the room to procure the necklace. During her absence Burke enters, and on her return is forced to conceal himself behind the curtains. He sees her place the emeralds in a desk, which she does not lock, and leave the room. Burke thereupon removes the necklace from the desk and is about to leave when Harrison enters through the window. Again Burke is forced into concealment. An instant after Clarissa returns, finds Harrison waiting and demands her letters. Harrison takes them from his pocket and asks for the necklace. Clarissa opens the desk and discovers the jewels missing. She instantly accuses Harrison of having taken them, and in frantic rage tries to take her letters from him by force. As they struggle Burke stuns Harrison with the butt of his gun from his place of concealment, and coolly takes the letters for himself. He is about to leave when Clarissa's three-year-old son in his night clothes enters the room.

Clarissa begs Burke to give up the letters at least, if only for the boy's sake, and after a struggle with himself, Burke throws the letters into the fire. He seems interested in the child and finally picks Harrison from the floor, and kicks him out through the window, following himself. Clarissa is seated before the fire with her son asleep in her lap when Burke returns. He stands looking curiously at the mother and son, and then, taking the necklace from his pocket, reaches over her shoulder and drops it upon the child's breast. As he is about to leave, Clarissa's husband enters, and Burke is once more forced to conceal himself. Clarissa, child and husband leave the room. Burke emerges, takes a cigar from the box on the table, lights it, shrugs his shoulders, and exits.

HOW TO MAKE A REPUTATION.—(June 29).—Philip ernon, an artist, is having a hard struggle to keep the wolf from the door. There is no food in the house, and he sends his wife and little girl out to try to sell one of his paintings, but they meet with no success. While they are away, Philip has a desperate idea, and it no sooner strikes him than he sets to work to put it into execution. He writes to his wife, Clarice, that life is not worth living, and asks her to kiss his child good-bye. Leaving this note on a table, he goes out into the world. His wife and little girl return, and the former finds her husband's note, and reads it. She bursts into tears, and the frightened little child calls in the neighbors. One of these pays a visit to the police station, and the news of the disappearance of Philip soon spreads. A journalist, on the lookout for copy, calls and interviews Clarice. In his study, a patron of art, on the following day, reads in his newspaper that the talented artist, Philip Vernon, has disappeared, and that an appeal is made for his wife and child. The notice in the papers has done its work, and, one after the other, wealthy sympathizers call, and soon Mrs. Vernon and the little child are in possession of a goodly sum, which has been realized by the sale of Philip's works. In the next scene Vernon is seen earning his living as a tattooist in a low-class hostlery. Picking up the paper, he reads that the young artist, Philip Vernon, who disappeared some time ago, was undoubtedly a genius. His object attained—that is to say, his reputation being now made—he thinks it about time to return to his wife, whose joy at seeing her presumably lost husband return, is unbounded.

REX.

THE WEIGHT OF A FEATHER (June 27).—Cleo was young, pretty and poor—a dangerous combination. She was employed in a fashionable millinery establishment, a disastrous environment.

Saturday Afternoon—Cleo was instructed to deliver a hat to a purchaser. She took it to the peacock's home, and finding her out, decided to take it home with her.

Sunday—Her sweetheart called. She looked at the old, soiled black straw hat, and thought of the tempting thing in the box. The call was strong to her eager ears, too willing to hear. She hesitated but a moment, and the lure conquered. She wore the hat.

As she was entering the house on her return, a careless smoker dropped his cigar through the window, and the Nemesis that pursues all Fate's toys caused it to fall on the hat. With a shriek, she threw the burning hat from her head. The delicate feather was ashes.

She knew not what to do. She could not face her employers and explain, she could not pay for the loss of the ruined hat, she could not escape from the relentless clutch of the desperate circumstance. There was only one escape, only one refuge.

But it was discovered that she had attempted to destroy her life in time or preserve it. The story was told, the old story of the serpent's voice and the yielding yearning. But even pretty pheasants have hearts, so she was forgiven. And she realized that her sweetheart's love was of greater weight than all the feathers in the world—and a great many other things.

LOOKING BACKWARD (June 30).—Sitting by the hearth, the old sweethearts see in the flames the happy record of their youth. How he met and loved her; how his father refused to consent to their marriage, and her plan to win his reluctant approval. She remembers how she went to the farm, with the bogus plea of being ill and needing country air. She recalls all the wiles and guiles she exerted in her effort to win his good graces. And—now they laugh—she remembers—it is amusing now that they have children of their own, though it was a mighty serious thing then—how his father fell in love with her himself, and proposed! She asked him to give her a little time, and she came to the city and told her sweetheart all about it. They visited a minister, and the son no longer feared his father's rivalry. Then they boldly returned to the farm, and told her other lover all about it.

It was a serious surprise to the father, but it was even more humorous, so—he took his sweetheart-daughter-in-law to his heart.

They remember it all, and their minds are busy with the happy recollections when their children rush in upon them. There is a bashful boy with their daughter, and the story that started fifty years ago is continued in the romance of the newer lovers.

PAT'S BREECHES (July 1).—Pat was a street cleaner, and with it a "devil" among the "gurls." One day he left his hose for a quiet little chat with a fair creature who lived in a doctor's establishment in the district where he plied his daily cleansings. The doctor had gone out and so had the doctor's wife, so this was a fine opportunity for a little spooning. While Pat was thus engaged, some street urchins began taking liberties with the street hose, much to the consternation of passers-by. Pat dashed up on the scene and they turned the hose on him, whereat he beat a hasty retreat to his girl's house.

Nora procured a dressing gown and put his breeches before the fireplace to dry. Meanwhile, the doctor returned and threw his overcoat over the chair on which Pat's breeches reposed, Pat hiding behind the screen. Back to their spooning went Pat and Nora, only to be disturbed again by the home-coming of the doctor's wife. She took her hubby's coat from before the fire and inadvertently, Pat's breeches were carried away by her into the doctor's room. Pat was in consternation, but Nora sneaked her hand through the curtains and brought forth the doctor's trousers. Before the exchange could be made, the doctor was aroused by a hurry call, and the room being dark he put on the white ducks of the Irish street cleaner and sauntered forth.

Arriving at his destination he found his patient in the final throes of dissolution, but one look at the doctor's white ducks which were halfway to his knees sent her into a fit of laughter. Discovering his ridiculous appearance he dashed away through the streets like a wild man towards home. Pat, in the meantime, had put on the doctor's trousers and, when the latter arrived, raving and wild, with drawn revolver, he shot at the man who dared to destroy the sanctity of his home, but he only succeeded in shooting off Pat's official hat. Nora flung herself on her knees before the doctor to explain the peculiar aspect of the case, and all parties became hilariously humorous over the amusing situation.

LITTLE OLD NEW YORK (July 1).—The scenes presented in this picture are instructive and interesting. There are three market places shown, the like of which could not be seen in any other portion of the globe. The Jewish market place gives us an insight into the thriftiness of this remarkable race in the environs of New York. The bartering—the criers—the itinerant peddlers—all are seen here in their glory. Next comes the Italian market. Here again we see the teeming multitudes, jostling one another and hustling to and fro like so many human bees in a monstrously large hive. We gaze on the scene with wonder.

But next and last comes the great market place of the world, "The Rich Man's Market," as it has been aptly called. What a contrast there is between this Wall Street environ and the places we have just left behind us! What an object lesson these three market places should be for us, the market places of the poor and that of the rich!

THREE MEN AND A GIRL (June 27).—John Henry Dubbs, a jolly, successful man of fifty, and Bob Andrews, a young electrical engineer, are fellow lodgers at the house of Mrs. Scrubbins, where also dwells a winsome little school teacher, Eleanor Edwards. Both men are in love with her, but have kept their sentiments pretty well covered. Andrews is unfortunate in the work of promoting an invention for electrical uses, and he is dislodged by the landlady from his room. In fact, she keeps his belongings to insure early payment, and his model for the patent is locked up with his other "duds" in the closet of his room. Now, it happens that George Haviland, a prosperous theatrical manager, is riding in his auto, and sees the beautiful young teacher walking home. He follows her and becomes a boarder at the table of the thrifty Mrs. Scrubbins, in order to meet this girl with whom he has fallen desperately in love. He is assigned to the room of Bob Andrews, and investigating the closet he finds the model. As a theatrical man, he realizes its great value for stage lighting effects, and he immediately begins interesting a number of capitalists and promoters in it, as his own discovery. Poor Bob Andrews, during this time, is wandering jobless, and altogether "down and out," when he is discovered by jolly John Henry Dubbs. The bachelor rehabilitates him, buys a new outfit of good clothes and reinstates him financially. He takes him to the boarding house again, where Haviland is making strenuous suit for the hand of fair Eleanor. They arrive in time to save the rights of the patent ownership, to thwart the sale by Haviland, and to land a snug fortune and more fame for Bob Andrews. John Henry Dubbs proposes and learns that his suit is hopeless, for the school mistress loves Bob, whose proposal is at last accepted, while old Dubbs retires to his library to dream in clouds of tobacco smoke of what might have been, comforted in the generous thought of his own help to the two young people.

A ROMANCE IN OLD KENTUCKY (June 25).—Sue, the pretty daughter of old Si Timothy, a mountaineer who is secretly a distiller of illicit liquor, is beloved by Joe Marsden, an honest young Kentuckian with a heart, a mind and a good body, but none too many of this world's goods. He is in disfavor with old Si because the latter wants Sue to marry Bob Cherrington, a supposed lumber

MAKE 50c DO THE WORK OF 80c

Always buy the regular M. P. Machine size 3 in One—½ pint for 50c. You'll save 30c, for you get 8 times as much oil as if you bought the small bottles.

And remember, 3 in One never deteriorates nor turns rancid. The last drop is just as good as the first.

3 in One is so clear and pure that the finest watchmakers use it. It lubricates perfectly every working part of every moving picture machine, star wheel, flywheel, shutter gear, rewinder and everything else that requires oiling. Makes every part run smoothly and much easier.

Repair bills and bills for new parts are chiefly caused by thick, greasy oils which collect dirt, gum and clog the delicate mechanisms, thus causing them to wear. 3 in One is absolutely free from grease—never collects dirt. Instead, it cuts away all dirt and gum and saves wear, tear and expense.

3 in One cleans and polishes all wood and metal surfaces around a theater. Positively prevents rust, indoors and out.

FREE OIL FOR YOU

A postal will bring you a generous free sample. Get yours today!

10c, 25c, 50c (the economical ½ pint size) for sale everywhere.

G. MÉLIÈS

THE COWBOY KID

A Photo-play which appeals to every lover of Western Life, showing the exploits of the eight year old "Danny," the youngest cowboy in the world. He alone discovered the revengeful plot to entrap his sister's fiance and by means of torture force him to acknowledge himself a thief and oust him from the country. With his sister's aid he released the artist and by his splendid riding brought the cowboys to the rescue whereby the gang of horse thieves who had so long terrorized the vicinity were finally tracked and all captured.
